PRINTED FOR HER MAJESTY'S STATIONERY OFFICE
BY THOMAS AND ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE, PRINTERS TO THE QUEEN, AND TO THE UNIVERSITY, EDINBURGH.

The late Dr. Stuart superintended the printing of the entire text of the present volume. His successor in the editorship of this series of the Scottish Records is answerable for the Preface and Index. What jottings Dr. Stuart had made for his intended Preface were put in his hands; but, generally speaking, they were not in so advanced a stage that they could be made much use of by another. One exception, however, there was,—an interesting and valuable note on a subject often referred to in these Rolls—the Second Tithes of Aberdeen—which was in a nearly complete state, and has been reprinted almost verbatim as Appendix No. I. to the Preface, along with the certified extracts from the Sheriffs' Rolls to which it makes reference.

PREFACE.

PREFACE.

I.

THERE can be little doubt that the Camera, or Royal Treasure-chamber, presided over by the Camerarius or Great Chamberlain, was one of the institutions for which Scotland was indebted to David I. The Constable, Justiciary, and Chancellor occur among the witnesses to the charters of Alexander I.; but the name of the Chamberlain is discovered for the first time in the reign of David. The word Exchequer, or Scaccarium, derived from the chequered cloth covering the table on which the accounts were reckoned, is first found in use in England in the reign of Henry I., and would probably be soon afterwards adopted in Scotland; but the fiscal system of Scotland, at the time when our records begin to throw light on it, is by no means an exact counterpart of that of England, one prominent difference being the absence of the separate office of Treasurer. The Chamberlain of Scotland was at once the collector and the disburser of the Crown revenues, and continued to be so until the time of James I., one of whose innovations was the introduction of the English office of Treasurer; and in virtue of this combination of functions, he was, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the most important and influential of the great officers of the Crown.

The ordinary sources of the royal revenue may be described generally as consisting of the rents of the Crown lands, with the payments due from the thanages, the casualties of ward, marriage, relief, and non-entry, exigible from time to time from the Crown vassals, the fines imposed by the Justiciary and sheriffs, the escheats of attainted persons, the fermes or maills of the royal burghs, and the customs on merchandise, with occasional compositions for letters of gift, remissions, and legitimations, and the castle wards—that is, certain dues payable by the lands in the vicinity of some of the royal castles for the expense of upholding them. Taxation was an extraordinary source of income, to which the King was not expected to have recourse except on the occurrence of great national emergencies.

Out of the revenues in his hands the Chamberlain had to provide for all the different branches of public expenditure, including the charges of the royal household, and such military expenses as were not covered by the obligation under which the community lay to defend their country. He further exercised a jurisdiction over burghs: it was one of his duties to hold a yearly ayre or circuit, for the purpose of regulating all that related to their trade and good government.[1]

The immediate receivers of the royal revenues were the sheriffs and ballivi ad extra, who gathered in the rents of the Crown lands, the feudal casualties, and the fines imposed by themselves, by the Justiciary, and by the Chamberlain at his ayres; and the magistrates and custumars of the royal burghs, who accounted for the burghal fermes and great customs. All these officers were, however, also to a large extent paymasters; in virtue of royal precepts they made extensive disbursements of a variety of kinds in their respective localities, so that it was generally but a small balance of the revenue collected by them that came into the hands of the Chamberlain. At intervals, most usually of a year, but sometimes longer or shorter, the different officers intrusted with public money, including the Great Chamberlain, had their accounts audited in Exchequer by certain Lords Auditors appointed by the Crown: and the audited accounts, or at least the more important of them, were engrossed for preservation, generally in an abbreviated form, on parchment rolls, and constitute a very important class of the public records. The now existing series of these rolls, though by no means unbroken, goes further back and is less incomplete than most other departments of the public records. The earliest original roll which exists in the Register House is dated in 1326; but two detached portions of the Exchequer Records of the previous century have been partially preserved in transcripts made by one of the most learned Scottish lawyers of the seventeenth century, the first Earl of Haddington. The one fragment extends from 1262 to 1266, the other from 1288 to 1290; and though in many places injudiciously abridged, and by no means free from copyists' errors, both are of great value.

[1] A list of the Chamberlains of Scotland from the institution of the office, so far as they can be traced from authentic documents, was at first intended to have been inserted here, but has been reserved for a future volume. No materials exist for making such a list absolutely complete, or giving more than an approximation to the periods during which the earlier Lords Chamberlain held office; and it has been found impossible, without delaying the publication of the present volume longer than deemed expedient, to make the catalogue as perfect as could be desired.

Under the editorship of Mr. Thomas Thomson, and the auspices of the Bannatyne Club, a portion of the Exchequer Rolls, extending down to the year 1453, was brought out in 1841 and 1845 in three volumes, entitled "Compota Camerariorum Scotiæ."[1] This work has become scarce, and it has the disadvantage to the general reader of being printed, according to the fashion of the time, with all the contractions of the original. For these reasons, and still more in consideration of the fact that a large number of additional early rolls have been discovered since it was printed, the present series is made to begin at the commencement instead of at the point where Mr. Thomson left off. This first volume comes down to 1359, and some of the most important accounts in it, including most of the rolls of the provosts and custumars of the burghs, are now printed for the first time.

The rolls are remarkable for the diversity of subjects which they help to illustrate. They throw much important light on contemporary historical events. They afford us not a little insight into the political, commercial, agricultural, and statistical condition of Scotland during the various phases through which she passed in the course of her picturesque and chequered history. From time to time they give us a glimpse of the home life of royalty and the habits of the nobility, and they tell us much about the occupations and amusements of our ancestors, as also their dress and food, and the expense of living. They likewise contain much material for the student of genealogy and family history, and their aid is invaluable in the study of ancient taxation and of the early history of the burghs. Here and there are found entries that rather excite curiosity than gratify it; but these obscure passages become fewer the more we approach to a complete acquaintance with the minute history of the time. In endeavouring to give, within reasonable space, some idea of this record, it is impossible to do more than touch on a limited number of its many features of interest.

The lucid explanation of the mode of holding the Exchequer contained in Mr. Dickson's Preface to the first volume of the "Accounts of the High Treasurers of Scotland," makes it unnecessary to do more here than call attention to a few indications afforded by the rolls in the present volume of the mode in which the audit was performed during the period embraced by them.

The names of the auditors are frequently, though not always, mentioned. In 1264, the account of the Earl of Mar, as Chamberlain, is audited by the Bishops of St. Andrews and Dunkeld, the Abbots of Dunfermline, Lindores, Holyrood, Scone, and Cupar, Sir R. Menzies and Sir John of Cambrun, Knights, and the Clerks of the Chancery and Court of the King.[1] In the time of Robert I. and David II. the auditors usually included the Chancellor, the Chamberlain, a few dignified churchmen, one or two other persons of consideration, the Clerk of Audit (Clericus probationis), and the Clerk Register.[2] The account of the Constable of Tarbart, in 1326, is audited only by the Bishop of Sodor and the Clerk of Liverance.[3] Scone is mentioned as the place of audit in 1264, Haddington in 1287, and Linlithgow in 1288.[4] The rolls of Robert Bruce's time are audited at Clackmannan, Stirling, and Scone. In the beginning of David's reign we find Newbottle, Clackmannan, Berwick, and Scone, as places of audit; and after the country became embroiled in war, the audits were at Aberdeen or Dundee, and in one instance at Restennet. Between 1327 and 1331 the auditors often sat twice in the year. During the troubled period which followed, their sessions became less frequent, several years occasionally elapsing without an audit.

The rolls contain many indications, in both text and marginal notes, of the care with which the audit was habitually conducted, and the accuracy aimed at. Charges were often disallowed on grounds which were explained. Sometimes the auditors objected to a charge as insufficiently vouched, or remarked that it seemed right, but could not be passed without a regular warrant; or they added a memorandum for further inquiry or for a reference to the King. At the same time, a minute scrutiny of the accounts as we now have them will bring to light a good many errors of summation which have been overlooked in the audit, a fact which need not surprise us, if we consider how difficult and cumbersome the most ordinary calculations were before the introduction of Arabic numerals.

II.

The fragments belonging to the time of Alexander III., and the few years immediately following his death, are the more valuable from the extreme scantiness of the material for the history of that period. From the accession of David I. to the death of Alexander III. Scotland had enjoyed more than a century and a half of progressive and almost unbroken prosperity, under a succession of wise and beneficent Sovereigns. David, brought up at the Court of England, had married the heiress of the Earl of Northumberland, and in her right possessed the honour of Huntingdon. Before he was King of Scotland, he had done a great deal towards Normanising Cumbria—that is, the country south of the Forth and Clyde—which he held as an appanage by bequest from King Edgar. On coming to the throne, he set himself to introduce into Scotland the orderly and settled sort of government with which England had familiarised him ; and so successful was he in achieving this, that at a time when England was convulsed with the factions of Stephen's reign, his dominions were the abode of peace and concord. His liberality to the Church was the outcome no less of wisdom than of piety : and baron, burgher, churchman, and peasant had their interests alike watched over. The Norman barons whom he brought in his train had, some by gift and some by marriage, acquired large territorial possessions ; and under him and his successors Scotland was becoming year by year more assimilated to her southern neighbour. Occasional misunderstandings there were between the two countries, but their general relation was one of amity; and David, Malcolm, William, and the second and third Alexanders, though ready when necessary to assert and defend their independence, acted on the enlightened conviction that peace was their true policy. In the meantime the intermarriages which continued to go on between the different races were gradually fusing the upper classes into one; and Norman, Saxon, Celtic, and Norse blood was mingled in the veins of many of the principal magnates of the country. Yet, as a considerable number of the greater barons had possessions both north and south of the border, there was almost of necessity among them a national and an English party, whose differences on any misunderstanding arising with England became an element of weakness, and who alternately held possession of the Regency in the minority of Alexander III., according as Henry III.'s influence rose or fell. Most prominent on the patriotic side were Walter Comyn, Earl of Menteith by marriage with the Countess, and the Comyn family generally, who, originally settlers from Northumberland, had, by a series of fortunate marriages, risen to great power and wealth, owning four Earldoms and vast possessions. On the same side was John Balliol, father of the vassal-king; while the anti-national interest included in its ranks the Doorward and the Earl of March, Robert Bruce, Lord of Annandale, the Earl of Carrick, and the Steward of Scotland. By the time that Alexander came of age, the date when the thirteenth century fragments begin, the opposing factions had coalesced. Walter Earl of Menteith was dead; but the Comyns were powerful as ever, the ostensible head of the family, Alexander Earl of Buchan, half-brother of Walter, being married to one of the three daughters of Roger de Quincy, co-heiress of the vast estates of the De Morevilles, and having through her obtained the important office of Constable of Scotland. Of hardly less consideration than the Earl of Buchan was the old opponent of the Comyns, Alan the Doorward, who was the owner of large tracts of country in the shires of Fife, Forfar, and Aberdeen. He had married the natural sister of Alexander III., and was accused of carrying on negotiations with Rome to have her legitimated, so that his children might be next in succession to the King's issue.[1]

The majority of the accounts preserved by Lord Haddington are those of the sheriffs. By the time

[1] There is an entry in the account of the Sheriff of Forfar, p. 26, of a present of forty cows sent by the King to his sister, through the Earl of Buchan, Justiciary. It is nowhere recorded that Alexander had any lawful sisters. The lady referred to was perhaps the Doorward's wife.

The Melrose Chronicle (page 179) has been represented as giving this matter a different complexion, and asserting that the King's (lawful) sister had two natural daughters to the Doorward, whom he was soliciting the Pope to legitimate: on which Lord Hailes (vol. i. page 197) remarks that Alexander II. could not have had a lawful daughter grown up in 1251, inasmuch as he had no issue by Joanna of England, and was only married to Mary de Couci in 1239. But, while the narrative in the Melrose Chronicle is rather ambiguously worded, it seems possible to read it in conformity with the ordinary version of the story, which is undoubtedly the correct one.

of Alexander III. the larger part of Scotland had been parcelled into sheriffdoms. The sheriff had superseded the Earl in what was originally the function of the latter, the collection of the revenue; and his duties also included the execution of the King's writs, and the holding of courts, civil and criminal. It is interesting to have such full information as to what the sheriffdoms and who the sheriffs of those days were. We find Alexander Earl of Buchan,[1] and after him his son Earl John,[2] sheriff of Wigtown. The sheriffdom of Inverness, which included the whole modern counties of Sutherland and Caithness, was held in 1263 by Lawrence le Graunt,[3] and soon afterwards by Alexander of Moray, who was also sheriff of Invernairn.[4] Walter (Stewart) Earl of Menteith,[5] William Comyn of Kilbryde,[6] and, after the death of Alexander III., Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell,[7] and the Steward,[8] were successively sheriffs of Ayr. William Earl of Mar,[9] and afterwards Duncan Earl of Fife,[10] was sheriff of Dumbarton. In Perth we find in 1262 Gilbert of Hay,[11] in 1264-6 John of Cambrun,[12] in 1289 Sir Nicolas of Hay, son of Gilbert.[13] Andrew of Garviach was sheriff of Aberdeen in 1364;[14] he had been preceded by G. of Maleville,[15] and was succeeded by William of Meldrum.[16] Alexander Hunyeth was sheriff of

Lanark in 1240,[1] and afterwards Hugh of Dalyell.[2] John of Lamberton,[3] and afterwards Patrick of Graham,[4] was sheriff of Stirling. John of Kinross was sheriff of Kinross,[5] and Hugh of Berkeley,[6] and after him Sir John of Soulis,[7] was sheriff of Berwick. Thomas Kauer,[8] Hugh of Abernethy,[9] and William of Soulis,[10] appear successively as sheriffs of Roxburgh. Alexander of Sintun was sheriff of Selkirk;[11] Sir Eymeric of Maccuswell of Dumfries;[12] and Sir Reginald le Chen of Kincardine.[13] Roger of Moubray was sheriff of Edinburgh, Linlithgow, and Haddington in 1263;[14] and the same three sheriffdoms were soon after held by William of Saint Clair,[15] with the addition in 1288 of Dumfries.[16] William of Montealt was in 1264 sheriff of Forfar,[17] as well as of Cromarty;[18] he was succeeded in Forfar by John of Fenton,[19] after whom came David of Betun.[20] David of Louchore was sheriff of Fife in 1264 and 1266,[21] and Constantine of Louchore in 1290.[22] Alexander of Montfort was sheriff of Elgin,[23] and William Wyseman of Forres.[24] The sheriff of Banff in 1264 was Alexander of Strathechin,[25] and in 1280 John

Comyn Earl of Buchan.[1] It has been said that Gillespic Campbell was in the time of Alexander III. heritable sheriff of Argyll; but the accounts give no countenance to the supposition that Argyll had yet become a sheriffdom,[2] or that the sheriff's office had begun to be considered an heritable one. The ancestor of the Argyll family is however mentioned in the account of the sheriff of Stirling,[3] in which £40 are deducted from the crown rents in respect of Mestreth (Menstrie) and Salwchop (Sauchie) given to Gillespic Cambell.[4]

The accounts of the sheriffs contain on the one side the receipts from the crown lands in money and farm produce, the annual returns from the wards, marriages, and relief of vassals, and the fines and escheats of the sheriffs and Justiciaries. On the other side are the miscellaneous household and other expenses of the King and royal family when resident within the sheriffdom, outlay for the repair of royal castles and manors, and for the defence of the country, pensions, salaries, gifts, and ecclesiastical dues, and balances handed over to the

[4] These were not the lands on which Castle Campbell was built. That romantic-looking fortress was acquired in the fifteenth century by the marriage of the first Earl of Argyll with Isabella Stewart of Lorn. It was then called "The Glowme;" and the same Earl obtained the sanction of Parliament to give it the name which it has since borne. (See Fourth Report of Historical MSS. Commission, p. 483; Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. 222.)

Chamberlain and different officers of the household for the King's use. We have a few accounts of ballivi ad extra, administrators of portions of the crown lands, or sometimes of lands temporarily in the occupation of the Crown,[1] two accounts of the bailie of Tynedale,[2] and one Chamberlain's account. The fulness of detail imparts in many instances a delightful freshness to the pictures presented.

The possessions of the Crown in the north-

[1] Among these is the account of Alexander Comyn, Earl of Buchan, as bailie of "Inuery" for repairing and garrisoning the royal castle there in anticipation of King Haco's invasion (p. 18). Some indication of the part of Scotland in which the castle so called lay, is given by the question raised, whether the Sheriff of Inverness or the bailie of Inuery was liable for the rents of Inuery at a particular term. None of the various places bearing the name of Invery had a royal castle; and the only plausible conjecture which the editor can form as to the place meant—an explanation for whose suggestion he is indebted to Mr. W. F. Skene—is that Inuery is an error of transcription for Vlerin or Ulerin near Forres, mentioned in the Chartulary of Moray, pp. 34 and 456, and now known as Blervie: it seems to be the only royal castle in that district not elsewhere alluded to in the accounts. Further information about Ulerin will be found in Dr. John Stuart's preface to the Records of the Monastery of Kinloss, p. xxxiii.

[2] When the treaty of Falaise was revoked by Richard I., it is understood that the manor of Tynedale was bestowed on William the Lion as a small surrogate for Northumberland. Here the kings of Scotland enjoyed jura regalia, and courts were held by their justices on the Mote Hill of Werk. A roll printed by the Archæological Society of Newcastle (Proceedings 1852, vol. ii. p. 257, and Appendix ix.) gives a very full account of the court held at Werk in 1279, and throws not a little light on the tenure of lands, the conditions of occupancy, the rights of the Crown, and the sort of justice administered in the baron courts at that early period. Sir Francis Palgrave has printed a rental of Tynedale nineteen years later than the account in the present volume (Documents and Records of Scotland, p. 3). This manor continued to belong to the Scottish Crown till the forfeiture of John Balliol in 1297, when it was bestowed on the Bishops of Durham.

eastern district—what may be called Scotland proper, in contradistinction from the semi-English Lothians, and the partially independent or semi-Norse north-west—were in the time of the Alexanders very large and valuable; but the accounts, in the abridged form in which we have them, are too full of etceteras and omissions to enable us to estimate exactly their rental or extent. The account of the Earl of Mar as Chamberlain, which seems to include that officer's receipts and disbursements for a year and a half, returns the whole sum passing through his hands as £5413, 13s., of which more than a half, or £2896, 18s. 3d., is described as derived from the rents of the Crown lands. This sum, however, can only represent the balances paid to the Chamberlain by the sheriffs and bailies, the actual rents being much larger. Of the Crown lands a portion was forest, a portion was demesne (terra dominica) directly in the King's hands, and cultivated by his liberetenentes, bondi, and nativi; and a large portion was thanage, the thane being a Crown vassal who held his lands by a tenure similar to what is known as feu-holding, the reddendo, instead of military service, being an annual feodofirma. On the history of thanage as developed out of the tribal customs of a previous age, it would be out of place here to enter. For the best explanation of it reference is made to two notes in Mr. W. F. Skene's edition of Fordun (vol. ii. pp. 414 and 441), in which that distinguished Celtic scholar has brought a large amount of learning and research to bear on a difficult subject. It may suffice in this place to say that it was a noble tenure, the thane's rank, though inferior to the earl's, being at least equal to that of the baron. Of the sixty-three thanages enumerated by Mr. Skene, a considerable number appear in these accounts. We find a thane of Aberdeen paying £12 of feu-farm, a thane of Kintore paying £17, 13s. 4d., also thanes of Glammis, Kettenis, and Forteviot. In more instances the hereditary thane has disappeared, and the lands are in the natural occupation of the King, or let on lease to a firmarius, who, however, may yet be a person of consideration.[1] It was not till after the War of Succession that the practice began of converting thanages into feudal holdings for military service.

Repeated allusions occur to a yearly tax paid by the thanes in addition to their rents, under the name of "waytinga," a duty which had come in place of the burden of entertaining the King in his progresses. The sheriff of Kincardine debits himself with the waiting of one night at Fetter-

[1] Thus the firmarius of the thanage of Fermartin is Reginald le Chen, afterwards Chamberlain, whose son married the elder daughter and co-heir of Freskyn of Moray. Occasionally land is found to be held in feufarm of the Crown, where there is no thanage, as in the case of six davachs of land held by William of Montealt, Sheriff of Cromarty, for 24 merks a year (p. 26), and of Cartland in the Sheriffdom of Lanark, for which 66s. 8d. were paid.

cairn,[1] the sheriff of Kinross with the waiting of four nights at Kinross,[2] and the sheriff of Forfar with the waitings of two nights at Forfar, and a night and a half at Glammis,[3] all places where there were thanages. The waiting of Forfar amounted to twenty-four cows per annum, that of Glammis to thirteen and a half cows.

In 1292, when the castles of Scotland which had been given into the hands of Edward I. in the previous year were delivered up by his directions to John Balliol, twenty-three of them are specified,[4] which were the great garrisons of the country. But over and above these, the accounts show Alexander III. to have owned castles, manors, or halls, in nearly every county of the Lowlands; and it was the practice of the King to move with his Court from one of them to another, looking after the administration of justice, consuming the agricultural produce of the adjoining demesnes, and occupying his leisure with hawking and field sports. Stirling was the most frequent abode of royalty; we find £83, 16s. 3d. expended during the year 1263 in constructing a new park or chase, and putting the old one in repair.[5] Under the Guardians of Scotland payments were made by the sheriff of Stirling for the feeding of does in winter, for the wages of a foxhunter to destroy vermin, and for strong wooden paling to enclose the new park.[1] Jedburgh too seems to have been a favourite resort of Alexander; his second Queen had a stud there,[2] and in 1288 there occurs an outlay of £5, 16s. 6d. for 900 perches of hedge and ditch constructed round the wood and the meadows, while £1, 6s. 8d. is stated as the produce of the sale of dead wood.[3] Linlithgow, Edinburgh, Roxburgh, and Elgin were also frequent abodes of royalty; and at Crail we find money expended on the castle, and payments made to the keeper of the rabbit-warrens.[4] Outlay is accounted for on the royal residences at Invernairn,[5] Invercullen,[6] Cowie, and Durris, and on a new park at Kincardine;[7] and in connection with a new hall at Kettenis we have mention of an important department of the households of these days, the wardrobe,[8] a repository not only for articles of dress, but for furniture not actually in use, and for foreign spices and confections. The sheriff of Inverness also credits himself with a new wardrobe as an adjunct of a "domus Scoticana" built for the King within the castle,[9] an expression whose employment indicates, what other passages also suggest,[10] and what we know from other sources to have been the fact, that wood was still the prevailing building material in Scotland.

[10] The details connected with the hall at Kettenis include the carriage of timber, the double

The castle of Forfar was a specially favoured resort of Alexander III., as it had been of his grandfather and his father; and one of the accounts of the sheriff of Forfar, which has been transcribed with less curtailment than usual, presents a very suggestive picture of his life there when in his twenty-first year. Three years previously he had repaired to the English Court with his Queen, the daughter of Henry III., who had for the first time a prospect of issue: on returning home for the winter he left her there, after exacting a promise on oath that the Queen and the expected infant should not be detained in England. In February 1261 Queen Joanna gave birth at Windsor to a daughter, afterwards wife of King Eric of Norway: both in due time returned to Scotland; and in the summer of 1263 the King, accompanied by the Queen, and probably—although she is not mentioned—by their infant daughter,[1] held his Court roofing of boards, the planks for the wall, and the carpenters' wages, but make no allusion to stones or masons (p. 14). The extensive additions made to the castle of Stirling are described in a precept of the Regents as new stonework (pp. 47, 48), as if the employment of stone in building were exceptional.

[1] In the following January, on the very day, it is said, when Alexander received the tidings of Haco's death, a son and heir was born to the Queen, named Alexander; and the expenditure side of the sheriff of Stirling's account of 1266 contains 2 chalders and a half of oats supplied for the service of the King's son (p. 23), then two years old, as well as 17 chalders 4½ bolls of malt for the use of the same Prince, for the space of a year and a half. It is for twenty-nine weeks and two days at the castle of Forfar.[1] The supplies consumed during that sojourn included forty-eight beeves, twenty-five swine from the adjacent forest,[2] thirty sheep brought from Barry, and forty from the Grange of Strathylif[3] (now Glenisla), sixty stone of cheese, three hundred and eleven fowls,[4] 17 chalders 1½ bolls of malt, 3 chalders 2 bolls of barley, and 38 chalders 8 bolls of fodder; and there was also a special provision of barley and fodder, though not of malt, for the Queen's use.[5] The lake of Cluny, which, in common with other lakes and ponds attached to royal residences, produced multitudes of eels, was made to yield seven hundred for the King's use, and ninescore for the Queen's.[6] Augustin, the King's tailor, was despatched to the fair at Dundee to buy cloth and fur.[7] We have payments for the wages of the King's falconer, groom,[8] and swineherd, and for the food of a bitch and her puppies.[9] The gardener got £5 yearly.[10] Twelve bonds of the King were paid £7, 5s. 8d. for twenty-three horses which had met their death in the royal service,[11] and six bolls of barley were paid to the man who carried the peats into the tower of the castle.[12] to be supposed that the latter supply was meant for consumption by the nurses rather than by the royal infant.

In the course of the same year the King made a journey to Inverness by way of Kettenis and Elgin, and his expenses going and returning are rendered by the sheriff of Elgin.[1] The following year we can again trace Alexander's progress as he went to Moray, making a stay at Aberdeen and Kintore, spending fourteen weeks at Forres, and visiting Cowie and Durris.[2]

A few items from the Chamberlain's account may be appended as touching on Alexander's personal habits. His household expenses for a year and a half (this must be in addition to such as are entered in the accounts of the sheriffs) are stated at £2224, 8s., those of the Queen at £795, 16s. 6d. For presents by the King the Chamberlain paid £122, 3s. 6d., and for the King's expenses at play £16, 2s. 9d.

In connection with the administration of the Crown lands we have a few glimpses of the agriculture of the time. A large portion of the rent was paid in oats, wheat, barley, malt, fodder, cattle, swine, and poultry. Of the three grains mentioned, oats was by far the most extensively grown. The usual price was a mark for a chalder, nore were held under the obligation to furnish 300 cartloads of peat for the King's use whenever he came to Forfar.—Reg. Mag. Sig., p. 116. The accounts show coal to have been in occasional use for fuel at this time. Sea-coal was provided for the castle of Berwick in 1265, at the price of 15s. for five chalders (p. 27). Evidence exists that the working of coal in Scotland had begun at a still earlier date.—See Innes's Sketches of Early Scotch History, p. 131.

but it occasionally rose to a pound. The price of a chalder of barley, usually a mark, sometimes fell to ten shillings. Wheat was generally sold at £1 the chalder. Ale was the great beverage of the mass of the people, and the malt was made sometimes of oats, sometimes of barley, and perhaps oftener of a mixture of both. Large districts of natural meadow furnished grass, which was made into hay; the price of fodder—"prebenda"—was four shillings a chalder, or sometimes less in a good year. We find beef largely consumed by the royal household. The hides of the cattle, besides being largely exported, were manufactured into useful articles of various kinds. Of the hides of eighteen beeves used at Roxburgh Castle, where was a large store of arms, the cook was to have nine, seven were to be appropriated to the military engines "ad machinas," and the crossbowman was to have the remaining two.[1]

The dairy was an object of attention in Forfarshire, where much of the Crown rents was paid in cheese.[2] The demesne lands of Forfar, Glammis, and Kingaltenyn together returned about 1600 stone of cheese annually,—cheese generally selling at sixpence the stone, but the superior quality of the cheese of Cule insuring it a higher price.[3]

Sheep are mentioned chiefly in connection with the Lothians; the price of a sheep was a shilling. The swine which grazed in the royal forests, and fed on beech-masts, seem to have been the chief food of the lower classes. A sow cost eighteen-pence, a gosling about twopence-halfpenny; and a hen a penny.

The steelbow system of cultivation seems to have been usual; an instance occurs in the account of the sheriff of Traquair in 1265, where two free tenants took in hand the reclamation of waste lands ad stuth, and each received half a chalder of barley, a chalder of fodder, and a horse to remain on the land.[1] The succeeding sheriff charged himself with grassums received from free tenants who had taken the waste lands of certain bonds for a period of five years.[2]

Gardens were attached to the royal palaces. The gardener at Forfar had, as has been seen, five marks yearly in 1263, and at the same date the gardener at Menmuir had one mark.[3] In 1288 the sheriff of Traquair makes mention of a gardener who had murdered his wife and absconded.[4] Sir William of Saint Clair in 1288 is allowed 18s. 4d. for wages to the gardener at Haddington, and outlay on the garden, but is told that he must in future keep up the garden at his own cost.[5]

Next to the Crown lands, the fines and escheats of the Courts held by the Justiciary and the sheriff were the most considerable sources of revenue. The criminal law was still in a very rude state; compurgation had not passed wholly out of use; a very large proportion of offences were punished by fine; and even capital sentence for homicide might be evaded by the payment of a cro or wergild, that is, of a number of cattle proportioned to the rank of the person slain. This usage seems to be alluded to in a memorandum by the sheriff of Ayr that he has in his hands the son of Gilaverianus, farmer of the Cumbraes, in pledge for a fine of fourscore cows incurred to the King by his father.[1] Thrice a year the Justiciary, who was the supreme judge, civil and criminal, held circuit courts at the head burgh of each shire for the administration of the law and the redress of grievances. It was, in theory at least, the King's duty to be present at these circuits, and there can be no doubt that some of the above-noted progresses of Alexander III. were coincident with and connected with the ayres of the Justiciaries. Under William the Lion a distinct Justiciary had been appointed for Lothian; and in the thirteenth century there were separate Justiciaries for Scotland, for Lothian, and for Galloway. There is said to have been at one time a further subdivision of the office,—Scotland north of the Mounth being separated from Scotland south of the Mounth. This however could not have been the case at the date of the accounts, as we find Alexander Comyn, Earl of Buchan, Justiciary of Scotland, making his return of the lucra of his office at Inverness, Invernairn, Forres, Elgin, Banff, Aberdeen, Kincardine,

Forfar, Perth, and Fife. These amounted in all—perhaps for two years—to £405, 3s. 5d.[1] We have accounts of Stephen Fleming (Flandrensis), Justiciary of Lothian,[2] and of Hugh of Berkeley, his immediate predecessor.[3] The issues of their courts, held at Berwick, Lanark, Peebles, Roxburgh, Edinburgh, Ayr, Dumfries, and Stirling, during a period which Lord Haddington's "etceteras" have left uncertain, came up to £620, 12s. 4d. In 1288 Sir William of Saint Clair, as Justiciary of Galloway, returned his lucra for a year as only £9, 1s. 8d.[4] Mention is made by the sheriff of Linlithgow of a payment made to the "clericus justiciarii" at a time when his master was absent "ad Sanctum Jacobum"—on a pilgrimage to the famous shrine of S. Jago de Compostella:[5] but this entry can hardly be interpreted as meaning a delegation of the functions of the Justiciary to his clerk: such a usage seems not to have been known for centuries after this date. The collection of the issues of Court was occasionally made under difficulties. Thus the sheriff of Fife reports that the fine of Duncan, nephew of the Earl of Fife, cannot be enforced by him, the said Duncan having no effects within the sheriffdom, and suggests that the sheriff of Perth, within whose jurisdiction his effects lie, should be called on to distrain for it.[6] The same sheriff further complains that he is unable to realise the escheat of a man who has been beheaded, inasmuch as Henry Burnet, "serviens justiciarii," had carried off his cattle; and the auditors add that they must be accounted for either by the Justiciary or his "serviens."

Generally speaking, a tenth, and in some instances as much as an eighth, of the fines and escheats of the courts of both Justiciary and Sheriff went to the Church, not by the general law of tithes, but in virtue of early royal grants. Within the dioceses of Aberdeen,[1] Moray, Ross, and Caithness they went to the Bishop.[2] In the sheriffdom of Kincardine the tenth of the lucra went to the Bishop of Brechin,[3] in that of Forfar to the Prior of Restennet.[4] In the shire of Perth a tenth went to the Abbot of Scone, if the fine were inflicted in Gowrie, to the Bishop of Dunkeld if in Stormonth or Strathern.[5] In Fife, not a tenth but an eighth of the issues of the Courts went to the Abbot of Dunfermline;[6] and in the diocese of Glasgow the Bishop of Glasgow had his eighth, his right extending over the diocese of Galloway in respect of the issues of the courts of the Justiciary, but not in respect of those of the courts of the sheriff, which were free from any ecclesiastical burden.[7] When the Crown remitted a fine the Church was, in general, still held entitled to its tenth or eighth.[1]

The entries regarding wards and marriages are often serviceable in correcting or supplementing the current histories of the leading families of the time. Take for an example the Earls of Angus. We know that Matilda Countess of Angus married Gilbert of Umfraville, and lost her husband in 1245. The accounts of the sheriff of Forfar tell us that the Earldom of Angus was in ward in 1264;[2] and from that of the sheriff of Roxburgh we gather that it ceased to be so a year or two later in consequence of the majority of the heir,[3] the same Earl who played a prominent part in the war of succession,[4] thus showing that Dugdale is in error in making him of age in 1259,[5] and corroborating the Chronicle of Melrose, which places the marriage of his parents in 1243.[6]

The romantic story connected with the marriage of the parents of King Robert Bruce has often been told. The young Countess of Carrick going out hunting one day with her esquires and handmaidens, met a gallant knight riding across the country, the son of the noble Lord of Annandale and Cleveland. "When greetings and kisses had been given on each side, as is the wont of courtiers, she besought him to stay and hunt, and walk about; and seeing that he was rather unwilling to do so, she by force, so to speak, with her own hand, made him pull up, and brought the knight, although very loath, to her castle of Turnberry with her. After dallying there, with his followers, for the space of fifteen days or more, he clandestinely took the Countess to wife; while the friends and well-wishers of both knew nothing about it, nor had the King's consent been got at all in the matter. Therefore the common belief of the whole country was that she had seized—by force, as it were—this youth for her husband. But when this came to King Alexander's ears, he took the castle of Turnberry, and made all her other lands and possessions be acknowledged as in his hands; because she had wedded with Robert of Bruce without having consulted his royal majesty. By means of the prayers of friends, however, and by a certain sum of money agreed upon, this Robert gained the King's good-will, and the whole domain."[1] Now it appears from the Melrose Chronicle,[2] and other authentic sources, that the heroine of this adventure was not, as Fordun asserts, the daughter of Adam Earl of Carrick, but the daughter of Nicolas or Nigel Earl of Carrick and widow of Adam of Kilconquhar, who in her right had enjoyed the title of Earl of Carrick, and died in 1270. The exploit, Lord Hailes remarks, "is rather that of a widow than of a virgin;"[1] but the accounts of the sheriff of Ayr for 1264 and 1265 show that in these years the lady's ward was in the hand of the Earl of Buchan,[2] and therefore that she was at least not a widow of mature years, but hardly above twenty-six when the encounter took place.[3]

[4] Our historians extol the disinterested patriotism of the Earl of Angus in requiring a letter of indemnity from Edward and the competitors before he would deliver up the castles of Forfar and Dundee to the English king. Keeping in view that this was the same Earl whose treachery a few years later enabled Edward to surprise the Scots by a night march and defeat Wallace at Falkirk, it seems more reasonable to attribute his scrupulosity in 1291 to prudence than to patriotism.

It is only an uncertain light that is thrown on the rather obscure history of the old Earldom of Caithness by the two accounts of the sheriff of Inverness, of date 1261 and 1266. In each account stands the entry: "From the fine (de parte finis) of the Earl of Sutherland of that year, £20; from the fine of the Earl of Caithness of that year, 50 marks." In the first half of the thirteenth century, the Earls of Caithness are known to have twice incurred the Royal displeasure. In 1202 Earl Harold had half his Earldom taken from him, and given to Freskyn of Moray as the Earldom of Sutherland, and was only allowed to retain the remainder on payment of 2000 marks of silver. In 1222 Earl John, believed, with or without cause, to be accessory to the burning to death of the Bishop of Caithness—an act of popular revenge for that prelate's over-rigour in the exaction of tithes—was, according to Fordun,[1] compelled to surrender a considerable part of his lands, but redeemed them the following year by a large payment. The entries alluded to seem to suggest that part of these fines had been commuted into an annual payment, with a portion of which the Earldom of Sutherland was burdened.[2]

As might be expected, there are frequent allusions to the prominent event of 1263, the expedition of Haco of Norway, ending in the battle of Largs, and the recovery of the Western Islands by the King of Scotland. The Hebrides had been ceded to Norway towards the close of the reign of Malcolm Canmore, the cession being afterwards confirmed by Edgar; and Alexander II. had made an effort to recover them, first by negotiation, and that failing by arms; but his enterprise was arrested by his illness and death at Kerrera. The Chronicle of Man represents the second Alexander as declaring his determination

[1] Fordun, Annalia, xli, xlii. Earl Magnus of Caithness is said by Crawford and succeeding peerage writers, to have obtained his Earldom in 1222, for payment of a yearly duty of £10 to Alexander II. and his successors; a statement which this editor has not traced further back than the preface to Sir James Dalrymple's Collections. There are no extant accounts of the sheriffdom of Inverness between 1266 and 1359. In the account rendered in the last-named year, mention is made of a payment of £10 due from the Earldom of Sutherland every seventh year.

[2] In each of the Inverness accounts already quoted, there is also entered a fine of 10 marks paid by the Bishop of Ross "de illo anno."

to "set his standard east on the cliffs of Thurso, and reduce under himself all the provinces which the Norwegian monarch possessed to the westward of the German ocean,"[1] a boast which would have been unmeaning had not a portion of the Scottish mainland, as well as the islands, been virtually under Norse dominion. Caithness had been but lately recovered by the Crown, and various passages of the accounts give us the impression that its loyalty was considered precarious. In 1263 the sheriff of Inverness credited himself with the support of twenty-one hostages from Caithness at the rate of a penny a day, as well as one from Skye at 1½d.,[2] and in the account of the following year he still entered the keep of the Caithness hostages for twenty-five weeks, at the end of which time they were dismissed.[3] For the support for half a year of a hostage of higher condition, "the son of Angus, son of Dovenald," that is, the future Alexander Lord of the Isles, with his nurse and another waiting-woman, the sheriff of Ayr paid £3, 19s. 10d., being 5½d. a day.[4]

If the Northmen justly attributed their defeat more to the unfriendliness of the elements than to the ability of the Scots to resist them, it would be a mistake to suppose that preparations for resistance had not been made. At Ayr, then a considerable shipping port, the sheriff had expended £60, 15s. 8d. in building ships for the King, and seven marks in the cutting, fashioning, and carriage of 200 oars, besides making payments to persons employed to watch the King's ships for twenty-three weeks, and to messengers sent on three different occasions to spy the movements of the enemy, with two marks and a half to the head crossbowman, and a mark for three dozen yew staves for him; and he asked to be allowed the customs on eleven score stones of iron imported and wrought into 1770 querrells or crossbow bolts. He further rendered account of the expense of 120 retainers (servientes) whom he had kept in the castle of Ayr for three weeks, owing to the failure of the burgesses to garrison that fortress as commanded by the King. If, add the auditors, this misconduct on their part be proved, this expense must fall on them; if not, on the sheriff.[1] The Earl of Buchan, as bailie of "Inuery," besides outlay for repairs on the castle and drawbridge, disbursed 104 shillings on the food of eight soldiers garrisoning that place for six months.[2] An entry of 35s. 6d., for watchers at the inland fortress of Stirling at the time when the King of Norway was in these parts,[3] seems not unconnected with an incident related in the Norse account of the expedition. Sixty of Haco's ships were, it is said, sent into Loch Long, commanded by the King in person. "When they came into the inlet they took their boats, and drew them up to a great lake which is called Loch Lomond. On the far side round the lake was an earldom called Lennox. In the lake there were a great many islands well inhabited: these the Norwegians wasted with fire. They also burned all the buildings round the lake, and made great devastation. Alan, the brother of King Dugal, marched far over into Scotland and killed great numbers of the inhabitants. He took many head of cattle, and made vast havoc."

The submission of Magnus, King of Man, immediately followed the battle of Largs. Fordun describes how Alexander set out on an expedition to subdue that island, and how, when he reached Dumfries, Magnus met him and agreed to do him homage. The accounts of the Wigtown and Dumfries sheriffs indicate that, before the matter was finally adjusted, various envoys, principally churchmen, had passed between Scotland and Man; and the latter sheriff credits himself with the cost of seven Manx hostages.[1]

Alexander next sent, according to Fordun, a large force of knights and natives, commanded by the Earls of Buchan and Mar and Alan the Doorward, to reduce those island chieftains who had remained faithful to Haco; and that this took place in the year 1264 appears from the entry, in the account of the Earl of Mar as Chamberlain, of £30, 13s. 6d. expended on food for 200 soldiers taken with him to the isles in the summer of that year by the command of the King.[1] In 1266 a treaty was concluded between Scotland and Norway, by which Man and the Sudreys were yielded to Alexander for a payment of four thousand marks, and an annual quit-rent of a hundred marks. The sheriff of Wigtown in his account for 1265 alludes to repairs, whose cost is not to exceed forty marks, to be made on the castle of Wigtown, "propter adventum Norwagiensium," probably to receive envoys from Norway sent to negotiate this treaty.[2]

Among public events of Alexander's reign, only known through these accounts, are two of those meetings of the great men of the realm which preceded the regular Parliaments, and are known as "Colloquia," held at Edinburgh in 1264, on which occasions beeves and sheep were provided for the King's use by the sheriffs of Edinburgh and Lanark.[3] A few salaries of public officers are specified; that of the Chancellor was £100, and of the sheriff of Edinburgh £13, 6s. 8d.

A fall from horseback in the dusk of the evening deprived Scotland of one of the wisest and ablest of her Sovereigns, and opened a very dismal chapter in her history. Immediately on the death of the King six Guardians of the realm were appointed to carry on the government in the name of his infant granddaughter, residing at the Court of Norway, who had in Alexander's lifetime been solemnly recognised by the prelates and barons as his successor in the event of his leaving no male issue. The second portion of the accounts preserved to us by Lord Haddington opens two years after this overwhelming calamity. None of the older historians tell us that a few months after Alexander's death, and even before the negotiations had begun regarding Margaret's marriage to the Prince of Wales, Scotland was plunged into civil war in support of the claim of Robert Bruce. The omission doubtless arose from the unwillingness of the generation who lived after the War of Succession to record anything that could damage the memory of the hero-king's immediate progenitors. That John Balliol, in his pleadings before Edward in 1291, made an averment to this effect was first brought to light by Sir Francis Palgrave ;[1] and the truth

[1] Balliol averred, "That when the bishops and great men of Scotland had sworn to defend the kingdom for their lady, the daughter of the King of Norway, and that they would keep the peace of her land, and when they had done fealty to her as to their lady liege, Sir Robert Bruce, and the Earl of Carrick his son, attacked the castle of Dumfries with fire and arms and banners displayed, and against the peace expelled the forces of the Queen, who held the same. Hence, Sir Robert advanced to the castle of Bot(il). He then caused a proclamation to be made by one Patrick M'Guffok within the bailiary of the said castle." From the imperfect state of the document the tenor of the proclamation cannot be gathered, but certain individuals were warned, and the result was that good subjects quitted the land and were banished therefrom. "Furthermore, the Earl of Carrick, by the assent and power of his father, took the Lady of Scotland's castle of Wigtown, and killed several of her people there."—Documents and Records of Scotland, by Sir Francis Palgrave, Introduction, page lxxx.

Some further light is thrown on these transactions by a muniment published in Stevenson's of Balliol's assertion is borne out by various entries in the accounts. The lands of Bardonan, in ward to the Crown, are reported by the sheriff of Dumfries to have lain uncultivated for two years in consequence of the war stirred up after the King's death;[1] and the sheriff of Wigtown, when making a similar statement about lands in his county, adds that the war had been raised by the Earl of Carrick.[2] The existing state of war is made the ground of claiming additional sums for the defence, custody, and watching of the castles of Dumfries,[3] Edinburgh,[4] Jedburgh,[5] and Ayr,[6]—claims which were in most cases admitted by the auditors.

III.

From the days of the Maid of Norway it is an abrupt transition to the closing years of the reign of Robert Bruce, when the existing rolls begin. Eighteen years of war, devastation, and foreign occupation had made the Scotland whose freedom was achieved at Bannockburn extremely unlike the happy and prosperous Scotland of the days of the Alexanders. Her resources were gone, and her

"Historical Documents," vol. i. p. 22. This is a bond for mutual defence and assistance entered into by Bruce's adherents at Turnberry on 20th September 1286, which, without an allusion to the infant Queen, contains a saving clause in favour of the King of England, and of him who agreeably to hereditary rights and ancient usages ought to occupy the throne.

people had for a generation been unused to peaceful pursuits. Those feudal lords who were also Norman barons had, of course, been unable to retain their lands in both countries; and such of them as elected to adhere to Edward had forfeited their Scottish possessions. The Comyns, whose interest would otherwise have attached them to Scotland, and who in the past generation were identified with the cause of Scottish independence, had been driven by circumstances into an attitude of opposition to Bruce, and forfeited their vast possessions. The Lord of Lorn, connected by marriage with the Comyns and Balliols, had ranged himself on the same side, and been stripped of his lands, a fate which also overtook his kinsman of Isla, who had aided and supported him. Fresh proscriptions followed the Soulis conspiracy, and the forfeited territories were in each case conferred by Bruce on those companions-in-arms who had aided him in bearing the brunt of the struggle. On his brave and distinguished nephew Thomas Randolph were bestowed large estates in the sheriffdoms of Dumfries and Berwick, the island of Man, and an extensive tract of Crown lands in the north erected in his favour into the Earldom of Moray. The Douglases, till then among the minor gentry, rose to such wealth and influence as enabled them, a generation or two later, almost to overshadow the Crown. The loyalty of the Earl of Ross was rewarded with large additions of territory and the hand of his Sovereign's sister. The share which Sir Neil Campbell got of the estates of the Comyns, together with the hand of Mary Bruce, laid the foundation of the greatness of the house of Argyll; and Sir Christopher Seton, Sir Andrew Moray, Sir Alexander Fraser, and, above all, the Steward, became more closely bound to the interests of their country, not only by gifts of land, but by alliances by marriage with the King. Sir Gilbert Hay got Slains, with the office of Constable; and Sinclairs, Lindsays, Gordons, Flemings, and many other families, were brought into a new prominence. The national feeling had become intensified, and military holding had become more universal.

The extant Exchequer accounts of this period are principally those of the Great Chamberlains and of the provosts and custumars of the burghs, with a few of the constables of royal castles and minor officers of the royal household. The accounts of the sheriffs prior to 1358 are almost entirely wanting.

The earliest roll is that of the constable of the castle of Tarbert.[1] While Alexander of Isla had been an enemy, his brother Angus Oig had been a very warm friend to Bruce; he had sheltered him after the battle of Methven till he could escape to the island of Rachlin, and shared in all his subsequent enterprises. Accordingly, when Alexander had surrendered to the King at Castle Swyn, his very extensive possessions, along with large lordships belonging to the Comyns and the Lords of Lorn, were bestowed on Angus Oig. It had hitherto been Bruce's usual practice to destroy the places of strength that fell into his hands; but he seems to have considered it inexpedient to leave the country defenceless on the side of the Isles. He had implicit faith in Angus's attachment to himself, but he, of course, could not equally rely on the fidelity of his successor. He therefore set himself to neutralise the effect of the addition to the power of the Lord of the Isles by erecting a stronghold on the isthmus of Tarbert, strategically one of the most important positions in the country. It was a commonly received story that Magnus Barefoot of Norway, when the Hebrides were ceded him by treaty in 1098, sailed round each island to complete his right to its possession, and that in order to include Kintyre among the number he caused himself to be drawn in a galley along the isthmus of Tarbert with his hand on the tiller. With the view of impressing the Highlanders with the completeness of his possession, King Robert, on paying a visit to the islands after his brother's departure for Ireland, followed King Magnus's precedent in circumnavigating Kintyre; and some years afterwards he proceeded to erect on the east side of the isthmus a strong fortress, whose ruin is still a conspicuous object to the traveller. The account rendered by John de Lany, constable of Tarbert Castle, of the expenses of the works which were in progress during the years 1325 and 1326, is of high interest, from the minute details into which it enters of the mode of building, and also from its glimpses of rural life. We have the particulars of the contracts of the different workmen, some of which are said to have been adjusted in presence of the King. The largest payment made was to Robert the mason, who, over and above the £282, 15s., and chalder of oatmeal and of barley stipulated for, got of the King's grace an additional £5, 6s. 8d., in consideration of the walls having been constructed of an extra thickness. £50 were paid for the burning of 660 chalders of lime; and the wages of the men who transported it, partly by sea and partly by land, from the kiln to the castle, varied from 13d. to 16d. a week. Neil the smith was employed at a salary of £12 a year. Patrick the smith had a supply of sixteen chalders of coals, costing 21s. 4d., for working 78 stones of iron, for which he was paid 19s. 6d. John the carpenter was paid at the rate of 3d. a day, and a boll of meal and codrus of cheese in the month; Donald the blocker at the rate of 15d. a day; and Neill the plumber, whose wages were 8d. a day, had a workshop built for him which cost 2s. 4d. The erection of a goldsmith's workshop cost 2s. 6d. The further details refer, inter alia, to the plastering and roofing of the castle, fitting up of its hall and wine-cellar, making a moat about it, also a mill, mill-dam, kiln, bakehouse, and brewhouse, with vat and sink, building barges for the transport of sand and lime, making canvas sacks to hold lime, and constructing a "pele" at West Tarbert, and a road from East to West Tarbert.

The King, who, down almost to the close of his life, was in the practice of moving about among the islands, had recently been sojourning at Tarbert, as had William of Lamberton, Bishop of St. Andrews, and James lord of Douglas, on whose visit we find litter provided for their apartments, and the hall and chambers decorated with branches of birch. There was a chaplain, with a salary of £4. Payments are made to servants in charge of cattle, poultry, and the sheep of the Queen; and four horses are brought from Islay by a messenger despatched for the purpose. Dofnald, Neil, and John, the three sons of Gilhon,—the youngest of them the ancestor of the Macleans of Dowart,—are helpful and neighbourly. Dofnald sends one of his ships to make the circuit of the Mull—"le Mole"; three codri of cheese are bestowed on his people who had charge of it, and men are sent to West Tarbert to watch it. Sir Arthur Cambel sends a ship to Tarbert, in which six men are despatched to the King in Arran. A portion of the necessary funds for the operations are supplied to De Lany by Dugal Cambel, sheriff of Argyll, and bailie of Athole, and a larger amount, in the shape of oatmeal and cheese, by John MacDonnyle, bailie of Islay. A payment is also acknowledged from Gilchrist M'Ay, who will be recognised by students of Highland genealogy as the progenitor of the Mackays of Ugadale.[1]

Of the accounts of the Chamberlain we have nearly a complete series from 1327 to 1342. Sir Robert of Peebles, a churchman, was Chamberlain when the accounts begin, and had recently succeeded Sir Alexander Fraser, the second husband of Bruce's sister Mary. We have on the debtor side of the accounts the periodical payments made by the provosts and custumars of the burghs, and by sheriffs and ballivi ad extra, the issues of the Chamberlain ayre and the Court of the Four Burghs, castle wards, and the proceeds of taxes. The creditor side contains, inter alia, payments for the support of the royal household, for the expenses of government, salaries of officers, pensions, and gifts, though a large number of payments of the latter class were made through the sheriffs, provosts, and custumars. It is only occasionally that the castle wards appear; the castles in whose behalf payments are made being Stirling, Dumfries, Edinburgh, Berwick, and Roxburgh.[2] Perhaps they were at other times collected by the sheriffs. Some of the fees or salaries and annual payments that recur from time to time may be shortly adverted to. The Chancellor, in which office Sir Walter of Twynham succeeded Bernard, Abbot of Arbroath, soon after the election of the latter to the see of Man in 1327, had 200 marks directly from the Chamberlain.[1] The Chamberlain had 200 marks, a fee which, soon after King Robert's death, was raised to £200.[2] The Clerk of Audit (clericus probacionis) of the King's house, an office filled by Thomas of Charteris (de Carnoto), a valued adherent of the King,[3] had £40;[4] the Clerk of Register, William of Irvine,[5] £20. The Clerk of Liverance, Sir Henry of Dumbarton, who had the control of the provisions supplied to the royal household, had £26, 13s. 4d.[6]

[3] Sir Thomas of Charteris was greatly regarded by King Robert and his son, from both of whom he had various grants of land in different parts of Scotland, including Kinfauns, in the shire of Perth (Robertson's Index of Missing Charters, p. 49, No. 9), transmitted by him to his descendants, the chief family of the name, who ended in an heiress married to Sir Henry Lindsay, afterwards thirteenth Earl of Crawford. Before 1328 Sir Thomas Charteris had been firmarius of the King's lands and mill in the shire of Selkirk, at a rent of 20 marks, and on David's accession he had a grant of the liferent of the same subjects at a reddendo of 10 marks (p. 150), the charter containing (according to Robertson's Index, p. 60, No. 12) a narrative of his father's services and his own. He was made Chancellor on David's return from France, and fell at the battle of Durham. Another member of the same family, Master Thomas of Charteris, is mentioned as Chancellor in 1290 (p. 49), and as having had the ward of Amysfield granted him by the Guardians of the realm after Alexander's death (p. 35).

occur from year to year. Sir Robert Bruce, the King's natural son, got 500 marks yearly.[1] Nigel of Bruce, otherwise Nigel of Carrick, probably another natural son, got £20.[2] Ellen of Mar, the King's niece, the lady through whom the Earldom of Mar afterwards passed by female descent to the Erskine family, got 40 marks yearly,[3] with seven chalders of wheat, in 1329 ;[4] her husband, Sir John Menteith, getting 20 marks and two chalders in the last-named year.[5] Gilbert Hay of Errol got a donation of £33, 6s. 8d ;[6] a Sir Nicolas Hay, £200, to provide for his daughter on her marriage.[7] Other receivers of gifts or stated payments were Murdoch Earl of Menteith,[8] the Countess of Lennox,[9] Adam of Arwes,[10] Matilda of Louchore,[11] and Alice of Wigmur.[12] Christian of Carrick got 40 shillings yearly at the King's pleasure, which annuity was declared to cease in 1329.[13] Various persons, both laymen and churchmen, including Sir Patrick of Charteris,[14] Adam of Buthirgask,[15] William of Fordoun,[16] William of Carlisle,[17] and John of Roxburgh,[18] received stated sums yearly till provided in a pension or benefice of a certain amount. the royal bounty. The King's interest in education is shown by payments made towards the expense of maintaining the son of Adam of Spots at the schools ;[1] to David of Montrose, clerk, for aid at the schools ;[2] and to Master Gilbert of Benauchtin, "causa studendi."[3]

Three pensions to members of the Saint Clair family appear first in the rolls immediately after King Robert's death. Sir Henry Saint Clair of Roslin, one of the heads of the national party, had by charter, dated 27th December 1328, a pension of 20 marks, granted to himself and his heirs till provided with lands to that value.[4] Sir William of Saint Clair, his eldest son, was one of the knights chosen to accompany Sir James Douglas on his expedition to Palestine with the heart of Bruce in charge ; and it is known to all readers of Scottish history how, in an encounter with the Saracens on the plains of Andalusia, Douglas lost his life in a fruitless effort to save his friend and comrade. One of Bruce's latest acts was to settle on Sir William of Saint Clair a pension of £40, in anticipation of the service he was about to do him.[5] He has been generally called Sir William Saint Clair of Roslin, but not quite correctly, for the entries connected with these pensions show, contrary to the generally received pedigrees, that his father survived him.[1] This record further indicates the existence of John of Saint Clair, another son of Sir Henry, who formed one of the same expedition, had a pension of £20, and was slain at the same time with his elder brother.[2] The pensions of the two brothers, on receipt of the tidings of their death in Scotland, were transferred to the youthful son of Sir William (afterwards Earl of Orkney), as heir to both.[3]

[5] In Robertson's Index, among the charters of Robert I., occurs "Carta Willielmo de Sancto Claro of ane annual" (p. 25, No. 20), and immediately following it, "Ane charter given by Thomas Ranulph Comes Moravie, Dominus vallis Annandie, et Custos regni Scotie, Roberto de Peebles Camerario Scotie, etc., de Willielmo de Sancto Claro of £40 pension, A.D. 1329" (p. 25, No. 21).

The expense connected with the audit of the Exchequer accounts generally appears in the accounts of the Chamberlain, and is given in great detail in those of 1328[4] and 1331.[5] The largest item is the expenses of the auditors, which, along with those of the purveyors, amounted, at the audit of July and August 1329, to £61, 10s. 8½d.[6] Disbursements occur in 1342 for marts,[7] and in 1359 for oysters for the auditors.[8] There are generally payments for the wages of couriers and carriages by sea and land.[9] The Clerk Register got on each occasion a gown, costing £2; there is also the cost of a cover for the chequer-table, of the making of the chequer, of ink, parchment, and clerks writing: other occasional items include "besandis" for carrying silver,[10] saddles, gratuities to different officers and to servants, and an allowance to the horses and boys of the auditors on the first and last nights of the session.[1] In 1331, £4 was paid to the Dominicans of Berwick, "ex consideracione auditorum compotorum," for a chalder of wheat and a chalder of malt for the soul of the late King;[2] and in 1342 the Minorite friars of Dundee received five marts in recompense for the occupation of their house at the audit.[3] The session of the auditors, during the period included in this volume, seems generally to have occupied at least three weeks; that of July and August 1329 lasted five weeks and five days,[4] that of 1359 seven weeks, from the 16th of March to the 5th of May, and was adjourned from Dundee to Edinburgh.[5] At a later period the sittings of the auditors became somewhat more prolonged.

An approximately complete series of burgh accounts begin in 1327, and constitute a very important class of the Exchequer Rolls. There is reason to believe that some of the principal Scottish burghs, including Berwick, Aberdeen, Dundee, and Inverness, had an existence before feudal times as places of foreign trade. Before such a code as the "Leges quatuor burgorum" could have been produced, municipal government must have had time to mature into a system ; and in the earliest reference to some of the towns of Scotland in charters of David I. they are called "King's burghs," whatever the force of that expression may be. Other burghs—and among the number Edinburgh, Stirling, Roxburgh, Forfar, and Ayr—seem to have sprung up at a later stage of our history round the castles of the Sovereign. When feudal ideas began to supplant the old usages of the country, the former as well as the latter class of burghs were taken under the royal protection, and had their rights defined by charter. Then the Church had its burghs, which were their property, as the royal burghs were that of the Crown. St. Andrews, Glasgow, Brechin, Dunkeld, and Dunblane had grown up around the nucleus of the cathedral ; and Jedburgh, Paisley, Kelso, Selkirk, Dunfermline, and Canongate round that of the monastery. Arbroath, which had existed before the abbey was founded, was made over to it by royal grant. There was also a class of burghs belonging to temporal lords, known as burghs of regality and barony. Some of these seem to have sprung out of villages or settlements, which were included in the lands bestowed, or which had grown up within them, and on which the lords of regality and barony had conferred burghal privileges.[1] In other cases the property of the burgh

[1] In many or most cases the charter by the lord of barony or regality would be confirmed by the Crown, or a new charter had been conferred by the Crown in gifts of regality. Renfrew had been given by David I. to the ancestor of the Stewards of Scotland, and Lochmaben to the lords of Annandale. By a somewhat questionable exercise of prerogative, King Robert afterwards conferred Lochmaben, as well as the northern burghs of Elgin, Forres, and Nairn, on his nephew, the Earl of Moray; and Cromarty was similarly conveyed to the son and heir of the Earl of Ross.

The burghs of Scotland owe much of their early prosperity to the large immigration of foreigners which had gone on during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The original founders of our towns are supposed to have been in many cases wanderers from Flanders, who brought with them their habits of industry and knowledge of trade and manufacture. Settlers of this description had come in great numbers to England in the reign of Henry I., and spread into the sister country; and when Henry II. drove all foreigners out of his dominions, they flocked into Scotland, where a more enlightened policy made them welcome.[1] granted. It has generally been said that no place could have the status of a burgh conferred on it except by royal authority; but it is not quite clear that this sanction was always obtained. The existence, however, of charters by David I. to the Bishop of St. Andrews and the Canons of Holyrood, empowering them to erect the burghs of St. Andrews and Canongate, and by William the Lion to the Bishop of Glasgow, to have a burgh at Glasgow with all the liberties and customs of the King's burghs, shows that the King's authority was at least held desirable.

Independently of their value in directing and improving the infant manufactures of the country, they became channels for the introduction of many imports from Continental countries. In Berwick they lived apart as a separate community; and they appear prominently in the accounts not only of that burgh, but of Perth, Edinburgh, and Inverkeithing.[1] Of English traders there is also occa-

In a confirmation by David II. of a charter by Thomas Earl of Mar and the Garioch to John of Mar, Canon of Aberdeen, of Cruterystoun, in the parish of Leslie, occurs the clause, "una cum lege Fleminga que dicitur Fleming lauch," ibid. p. 548). A letter supposed to be from Robert Bruce to the merchants of the dominions of the Count of Hainault, declares his will that they with their ships and goods should be received with honour, and permitted to dispose of their merchandise.

[1] Pages 78, 93, 95, 97, 98, 100, 201, 371, 353. Some of the Flemish settlers were of great use in time of war. Of these the most famous was John Crab, frequently mentioned in this volume. He first came into notice at the siege of Berwick in 1319, when the stones discharged from his crane shattered the roof of the English "sow;" and payments occur for his services at Berwick in 1329 and 1331, in the last-named year to as large an amount as £180 (pp. 64, 81, 398). In the course of one of his naval raids he had committed depredations on one Emmeric, a Lombard, whom the Chamberlain had in 1329 to indemnify (p. 213). At Edward Balliol's siege of Perth in 1332 he conducted a fleet of ten ships from Berwick to the Tay, and captured Henry of Beaumont's ship, the "Beaumontscogge;" but his vessels were burned in the engagement that followed, and the Treasury had to refund £359, 4s. to the Flemings who owned them (p. 450). Shortly afterwards Crab acquired lands in or about Aberdeen (Robertson's Index, p. 15, No. 21, and p. 16, No. 20); and his name occurs in the burgh accounts as a burgess and custumar of Aberdeen (pp. 587, 595). He was also one of the Commissioners of the burghs in the Parliaments of 1365 and 1367 (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. pp. 495, 501).

sional mention, including an allusion to an English factory at Clackmannan.[1]

The burghs of Scotland, unlike those of some other countries, never occupied a position of antagonism to the lords of the soil. There was, generally speaking, an excellent understanding between baron and burgess, and trade was held in almost as high honour as in Venice and Genoa. Even at the early period to which this volume relates, the younger son of a landed man was not considered to compromise his rank by becoming a merchant burgess; and the merchant burgess of pure burgess blood who acquired large wealth, or, still more, who did a gallant or daring act, might occasionally emerge into the landed class.

In the course of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the burghs of Scotland had made rapid strides in wealth and importance. Far the most considerable of them was Berwick. The chronicler of Lanercost's glowing description of it as a second Alexandria[2] has often been quoted, as has the circumstance that at a time when the whole customs of England did not exceed £8411, 19s. 11½d., those of Berwick were assigned by Alexander III. to a merchant of Gascony for a debt of £2197, 8s. incurred for wine and corn.[3] Inverness must have had a reputation in foreign parts for shipbuilding; what Mathew Paris calls a "noble ship" was built there for the Count of St. Pol and Blois, when he was preparing to accompany St. Louis to the Holy Land.[1]

The first act of the War of Succession was the sack of Berwick by Edward I., in which the inhabitants were put to the sword, and their property wantonly destroyed, and the streets are said to have run with blood for two days. But much as Berwick and the other burghs suffered during that eighteen years' struggle, they were at its close comparatively less impoverished than either the Crown or the nobility; and on the restoration of order they were instinctively felt to be more a power in the State than formerly. Though not as yet represented in the General Council of the kingdom, they possessed a council, or rather councils, of their own. In the south there was the Court of the Four Burghs—Berwick, Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and Stirling,—presided over by the Chamberlain, which produced the code of burgh laws that bears their name; and the burghs north of the Mounth had their "free hanse" recognised and confirmed to them by William the Lion. But the first occasion when burgesses are known to have sat along with earls and barons in the great deliberative assembly of the country convened by the King, was at the

of England, as overlord of Scotland, who summoned John Balliol to answer the complaint. Still, the merchant was satisfied with the security.

Parliament held at Cambuskenneth in 1326, the year when the rolls begin. It was there resolved that in consideration of the diminished value of the royal lands and revenues, the result of the protracted war, a tenth penny should be granted to the King out of all fermes and rents, to be computed, unless in cases of very exceptional devastation, according to the old extent of the reign of Alexander III. It is commonly inferred that from this time forward the burghal representatives formed an essential part of the great council of the realm; but what fragments we have of the records of the Parliaments of Robert I. and David II. do not quite certainly warrant such a conclusion.[1] The precedent, however, could not fail to have its weight in after-times.

The audited accounts of the burghs are of two different classes, generally engrossed on opposite

[1] The confirmation of its proceedings at a Parliament held in Edinburgh the following year almost looks as if this Cambuskenneth Parliament had been regarded rather as an abnormal assembly convened for an unusual purpose than as one of the regular national councils. It is observable that it lacked one of the usual elements of a Parliament, namely, the presence of the churchmen. It is not clear that the burghs were represented at the Parliament of 1327-8, which settled the terms of the peace with England, although its deliberations also involved an important measure of general taxation. In one of the two indentures then drawn up, and afterwards confirmed by Edward III., it was "le roi d'Escoce prelatz et autres grauntz de son roiaume" who became bound to pay the £20,000 indemnity; the other indenture bears to be between Robert King of Scots, "de consensu prelatorum, comitum, baronum et aliorum procerum ac communitatum regni Scocie" on the one hand, and the English Commissioners on the other.

sides of the burghal rolls—the one rendered by the provosts, bailies, or farmers of the burghs, the other by the custumars.

Originally each burgher, in virtue of his separate toft or tenement, was a Crown vassal paying a fixed yearly rent; and officers appointed by the Crown gathered these rents, and accounted for them periodically. To the King also belonged the fines awarded in the courts of the royal burghs, and the burghal toll or parva custuma, which were collected by the same Crown officers. Convenience however introduced, about the beginning of the fourteenth century, an arrangement which had become nearly universal before the War of Succession: the burgesses got short leases from the Chamberlain, by which, in consideration of a specific reddendo paid to the King, they acquired a right to the rents, issues of court, and petty customs. These leases were granted on sufficiently easy terms to afford to the town in its corporate capacity an adequate income for the management of its affairs; occasionally a grassum was paid on their renewal.[1] The officers who accounted for the fermes are, during the first half of the fourteenth century, generally called prepositi, occasionally ballivi, the latter name having probably survived from the period when the collectors of the fermes were Crown officers. The word prepositus cannot be considered equivalent to the modern provost, inasmuch as it is generally used in the plural, with reference to each burgh of any size. About the period when this volume closes, ballivus again becomes the most usual designation of the officers in whose names the burgh accounts run.[1] In a few cases a feudal lord or lords was tenant instead of the town; in 1327 and 1330 we find the rents of Berwick farmed by Sir Alexander Seton and Reginald More;[2] Thomas of Charteris was farmer of Roxburgh from 1329 to 1331, and Adam of Buthirgask of Cullen in 1343.[3] In Cullen in 1327,[4] and Montrose in 1329,[5] the account runs in name of the "Custos" of the burgh.

Out of the practice of leasing the burghs grew another arrangement, by which the burgesses got charters of feu-farm from the Crown, converting their tack into a perpetual right. Aberdeen alone was in that position at the time when the accounts commence; it had obtained in 1319 a feu-charter for a yearly reddendo of £213, 6s. 8d.[6] Edinburgh was placed on a similar footing in 1329, and paid 52 marks.[7]

[1] In the Deputy Chamberlain's account of 1359, a payment is entered "ballivis et preposito burgi de Edinburgh." Mayor and Alderman were terms in use as designations of the chief magistrate of the more important burghs. Payments occur in the accounts of 1330 and 1332 to the mayor and community of Berwick (pages 313, 410). In April 1359 the account of the fermes of Ayr is rendered by the alderman of that burgh in name of the bailies (page 609).

In 1327 Berwick still paid the highest rent of any burgh, namely, £266, 13s. 4d.;[1] Aberdeen came next, paying, as has been seen, £213, 6s. 8d.;[2] then Perth, which paid £160.[3] Inverness paid £46,[4] Stirling £36,[5] Edinburgh £34, 18s. 8d.,[6] Ayr £30,[7] Rutherglen £30,[8] Haddington £29, 6s. 8d.,[9] Peebles £23, 6s. 8d.,[10] Crail £22, 9s. 4d.,[11] Dundee £22,[12] Dumbarton £22,[13] Banff £21, 6s. 8d.,[14] Roxburgh £20,[15] Cullen £20,[16] Forfar, Dumfries, and Wigtown, each £18, 13s. 4d.,[17] Inverkeithing £15,[18] Montrose £13, 2s.,[19] Lanark £12,[20] Kintore £12,[21] Linlithgow £10,[22] Kirkcudbright £9,[23] Fyvie £6, 3s. 4d.[24] Mill of Mouskis, included among the burghs, returned £2.[25] The aggregate was £1133, 3s. 4d.[26]

Like Kintore, the royal burgh of Fyvie sprang up under the protection of the king's castle, and had its hostilage; and the rents of these two burghs are sometimes accounted for together (pages 419, 470). While Kintore has remained to the present day a royal burgh and one of the smallest in Scotland, Fyvie ceased to be so at an early period.

[25] Page 72. Auchterarder, although it paid no rent, returned the tenth penny, old extent, at 5s. 6d. per annum (page 94). There are no returns from the provosts of Cupar-Fife, though the custumars of that burgh appear at each audit.

[26] Between 1327 and 1332 a rise will be remarked in the rents paid under the burgh tacks. At the last audit before the troubles of David's reign began, the rent of Dumfries had been raised to £30, of Dundee to £27, of Roxburgh to £26, 13s. 4d., of Peebles to £26, 13s. 4d., of Dumbarton and Banff to £24, of Crail to £26, 6s. 8d., of Montrose to £20, of Forfar to

For the period between the Cambuskenneth Parliament and the death of King Robert, the tenth penny, old extent, appears in addition to the rents on the charge side of the accounts, or at least of some of them,—for there is no return of the tenth penny from Berwick, Inverness, Dumbarton, Ayr, Crail, Dumfries, or Inverkeithing. A few explanatory remarks may, with advantage, be inserted here on the ancient valuation of the lands of Scotland, a subject which, down to the Reform Act of 1831, was of more than antiquarian interest, inasmuch as the possession of a forty-shilling freehold of old extent was the requisite qualification to vote at a county election. A dispute regarding a claim to vote for a member for the county of Edinburgh,[1] had the fortunate result of calling forth from the pen of Mr. Thomas Thomson, as one of the printed pleadings in the case, a paper full of learning and research, which may still be referred to as containing the best extant account of this and other old valuations of land in Scotland.

The old extent may be defined as a valuation of the whole temporal lands of the country, which in the time of Alexander III. was preserved among the muniments of the Crown, and continued to be appealed to in subsequent reigns as the basis of territorial imposts. It was probably the result of separate assizes held from time to time by sheriffs and other officers of the Crown; and how old it may in some cases be it is difficult to conjecture. As far back as 1189 an aid was granted to William the Lion to enable him to pay to Richard I. the 10,000 marks by which he was freed from the obligations extorted from him as a captive, and a further aid of 16,000 marks was granted to the same King by the barons and burghs in 1211. There must have been valuations coeval with these aids; and the old extent may in many cases be based on an inquest as early as one or other of these dates. The long period of tranquillity and prosperity which Scotland had experienced had no doubt greatly raised the value of land; and the extent in use in the time of Alexander III., while sufficiently indicative of the relative value of the lands in the kingdom to be an equitable basis for taxation, must in all cases have fallen far below the absolute value.[1] But the war had pressed with unequal severity on different parts of the kingdom, and at the time when the Cambuskenneth Parliament granted the aid to King Robert, the old extent could no longer be depended on as affording the same fair criterion of relative value. A proviso was therefore contained in the grant that in cases where lands had been so desolated by war that the tax could not be levied, they might be revalued by the sheriff, and evidence exists that this was occasionally done.

While then the correspondence or non-correspondence of the tenth penny, as it appears in the rolls, with the actual tenth of the burgh fermes, can give no indication of the condition of each town as compared with its condition in the time of Alexander III., it may perhaps, roughly, afford some indication of the relative condition of the different burghs before and after the war. In Banff the old extent tenth had become one-fiftieth of the actual value, in Cullen one twenty-seventh, in Forfar, Stirling, and Peebles one-nineteenth, in Perth one-eleventh, and in Aberdeen it exactly corresponded with the existing tenth. In Haddington, Roxburgh, and Rutherglen it was now one-ninth, in Montrose one-eighth, in Edinburgh one-fifth, in Linlithgow one-third, in Lanark three-eighths, and in Dundee two-thirds, of the actual reddendo to the Crown. The reader must however be cautioned against founding too much on these figures, as we have no certain knowledge of the principle on which the old burgh valuations were made.

Forests, rabbit-warrens, and fisheries were valuable adjuncts of different burghs; and every burgh had its mill, whose receipts were generally included in the rents and issues farmed by the provosts, though, sometimes, as in the case of Inverness in 1328,[1] it was let separately by the King. The discharge side of the provosts' accounts often contains disbursements for the repair and reconstruction of mills,[1] annual payments for water-supply furnished by some neighbouring landowner,[2] or grant of multures, or gifts of part of the receipts from mills to churchmen, or occasionally to laymen.[3]

The provosts of the burghs credited themselves largely with ecclesiastical dues and alms. The rents of Aberdeen, Banff, Cullen, and Kintore paid second tithes to the Bishop of Aberdeen,[4] those of Forfar and Montrose to the Prior of Restennet,[5] and of Linlithgow to the nuns of Manuel,[6] rights which, like the tithes of the issues of the King's Courts already alluded to, had their source in royal charters. There are numerous payments to religious houses,—including the abbeys of Dunfermline, Kelso, Melrose, Newbottle, Dryburgh, Scone, and Cambuskenneth, and the priories of St. Andrews, May, and Southberwick —in virtue of grants by successive sovereigns from David I. downwards, many of which can be traced in the chartularies. Nor had King Robert been less liberal in such grants than his predecessors; the largest annuity of this kind which appears in any of the burgh accounts being one of £100, accorded by him to the abbey of Melrose out of the fermes and customs of Berwick, or, in case of their failure, out of those of Edinburgh and Haddington.[1] The same King bestowed on the abbey of Dunfermline half of the Queen's Ferry (passagium regine), forfeited by Sir Roger of Moubray, with the ferry chapel, and four marks yearly for a chaplain out of the fermes of Inverkeithing[2]—an annualrent which is a regularly recurring item in the accounts of that burgh.[3] In virtue of a series of charters of William and Alexander, confirmed by Robert Bruce, £11 was annually paid at Rutherglen to the chapter of Glasgow for the maintenance of the lights there, and of a chaplain, deacon, and subdeacon.[4] There are also yearly allowances to the different orders of friars out of the rents of the principal towns where they had their settlements,—to the Dominicans at Perth, Aberdeen, Edinburgh, Ayr, Inverness, and Stirling; to the Minorites at Dumfries and Dundee; and to the Carmelites at Aberdeen, Perth, and Berwick; nor was the preceptory of Torphichen forgotten, or the hospitals that took charge of the sick and the poor. One of the yearly payments at Aberdeen was an offering by the King to the famous shrine of St. Gilbert of Dornock,[5] a chalder

[5] Gilbert of Moray, Bishop of Caithness, built the cathedral of Dornock at his own expense, and used all his extensive family and other influence in benefiting his diocese. "The result of the government of Bishop Gilbert was such that he gained the affections of the people, by whom he was believed to have worked miracles. He was afterwards of corn and tun of wine "pro confeccione corporis Christi,"[1] and at Cullen £4 was paid to a chaplain celebrating for the soul of the Queen, King Robert's second wife.[2] Payments to religious houses encroached on the fermes of Perth to the extent of £60, 19s., and on those of Berwick to that of £125, 6s. 8d.

Many annual and other payments are made out of the fermes of the burghs to the King's old associates, or others who had deserved well of him. Out of the rents of Crail a pension of £10 was paid to Sir William of Cambow.[3] Adam of Moray, Bishop of Brechin, besides a pension of £12, 5s. 4d. due from the fermes of Montrose,[4] received £20 per annum out of the fishings of Sleples, belonging to the town of Perth, "for services performed and to be performed."[5] Of the services referred to we have a glimpse, as we find the prelate acting as envoy to Rome in the closing years of King Robert's reign,[6] present in France with David II.,[7] and after David's return intrusted with the management of affairs of moment, both at home and abroad.[8]

[8] Page 506. Part payments were made to him by the provosts

Many payments of occasional occurrence on the discharge side of the accounts of the provosts, made in virtue of royal precepts, were such as at other times appear in the account of the Chamberlain.

Supplies for the royal household are prominent on the same side of some of the burgh accounts, either of the special produce of the respective burghs, or of articles imported from abroad. Thus Ayr habitually supplied herrings and haddocks;[1] Forfar eels;[2] Crail rabbits from the Isle of May, with herrings and porpoises;[3] and Perth, salmon, as well as foreign cloth, furs, spices, and confections.[4]

The custumars, whose accounts generally occupy the dorse of the burgh rolls, were persons appointed by the Crown in each burgh of export, being generally one or two of the leading burgesses[5] to collect the King's great custom. Till the end of the sixteenth century free trade in imports may be said to have prevailed in Scotland. There was, no doubt, the toll or parva custuma, under which term was included a duty on nearly all articles brought to market in burghs, either from the country or from abroad—payable either at the town gate, in the market, or on leaving the town—as also harbour duties on ships arriving in port. The petty custom was regulated by the codes known as "Assisa de tolloneis" and "Custuma portuum," which date from the time of David I.,[1] and were probably in full observance in the reign of Robert Bruce.[2] Though mention is made in the Capitular known as the "Iter Camerarii" of the Custumarii parve custume, there is no indication that there were such officers in the fourteenth century. The petty customs, instead of being exacted directly by the King, were, as above stated, levied along with the rents of the burgh tenements and the issues of the Courts, by the provosts of the burghs. Whenever the King was pleased to remit

[5] For some years after the burgh records begin, we find a female custumar in office at Dundee, Marjory of Schireham (pp. 76, 95, 170, 275, 316), who, besides having the usual remuneration out of the customs collected, gets an annual pension of four marks for six years, beginning in 1326 (pp. 77, 172, 317, 368). On one occasion she is empowered by the Chamberlain to receive on his behalf a payment made by herself and the other custumar (p. 171).

[1] As evidence that these codes date from the period when Northumberland and Lothian were under the same law, see Mr. Innes's comparison between their tariff and the toll of Newcastle, as given in the "Northumberland chartulary" in a handwriting of the time of Edward III.—Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. pp. 40, 41.

[2] It has been asserted (see note page 100 of Ancient Laws and Customs of the Burghs of Scotland, Scottish Burgh Records Society) that in these and other collections of ancient burgh laws there is much confusion between the great and the petty customs; but this is not the case. Though article 5 of the "Assisa de tolloneis" specifies the custom of wools, woolfells, and hides—then the chief exports of the country—the duty mentioned is a burghal tax exigible at the town gate or in the market, trifling in amount compared with the great custom on the same articles. Thus eightpence is given as the toll on a last of hides, whereas the export duty was a mark. While fourpence was the petty custom on a sack of wool, the great custom was 6s. 8d.

the parva custuma on merchandise brought from abroad, as in the case of Peter the machinist, sent to Flanders to buy furnishings for David's wedding, the remission appears on the credit side of the account of the provosts;[1] and in like manner we find the provosts of Dumbarton crediting themselves with a grant by the King out of the petty customs of that burgh to Simon de Camera.[2] One instance indeed occurs of the parva custuma not being paid to the provosts, but it is the exception that proves the rule. During the wars of David II.'s reign, when Perth, newly recovered from the English, was for three terms directly in the hands of the King, William de Dispensa, the Crown receiver of rents, charged himself with £4, 8s. 2d. as the petty custom of the burgh for these terms.[3] As this small sum included the toll on country produce brought into the town, only a fraction of it can have been paid on goods imported from abroad. The insignificance of the tax on imports—if it can be so called—will be more evident if we compare this return with that of the same William de Dispensa in his capacity of custumar, where he

[3] Page 484. In some, though not all, of the feu-charters granted to the burghs, toll and petty custom are expressly enumerated among the rights conveyed. See the charter of Aberdeen above alluded to, that granted by David II. to Montrose, which is described in detail in a Montrose account of 1375 (Vol. ii. p. 491), that granted by James II. to Peebles (Charters of Peebles, Burgh Records Society, p. 16), etc.

returns the great customs of Perth for a year at £53, 2s. 8½d.[1]

The great custom was, in the time of Robert Bruce, charged on three classes of exports,—wools, woolfells, and hides; and the custumars of every burgh of export rendered an account at each audit of the lasts, sacks, and stones of wool, the number of woolfells, and the lasts and dacres of hides exported, with the number of vessels on board of which they were shipped, and the whole duty paid. The last of wool consisted of ten sacks,[2] and the sack of twenty-four stones. The last of hides contained twenty dacres,[3] and the dacre ten or twelve hides.

[1] Page 538. The opinion here expressed that free trade in imports was the rule in Scotland till a comparatively late date, is illustrated and confirmed by the preamble of an Act passed in 1597, which sets forth that it has been the practice of all countries, except Scotland, to pay custom or other exaction on goods imported, that the subjects of the country, by reason of an alleged bypast immunity, claim the privilege of exemption, but that his Majesty, as a "free prince of a soverane power," ought to have the same custom as other princes, "for the entertenying of his princely port." The Act directs a custom to be levied on cloth and other merchandise imported at the rate of 12d. on every pound worth of goods.—Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. iv. pp. 118, 135. Strenuous remonstrances were made against this measure by the Convention of Royal Burghs, who characterised the duty on imported goods as "ane new and intollerabill custome."—Printed Records of Convention of Royal Burghs, vol. ii. p. 200.

[3] This appears from entries in later accounts, as in that of the custumars of Edinburgh for 1360 (to appear in vol. ii. p. 8), where £4, 6s. 4d. is given as the custom of 2 lasts 4 dacres and 4 skins at the advanced rate of forty shillings per last, and £1, 9s. 8d. as that of 11 dacres, at the rate of 4 marks the last. The "Assisa de Tolloneis," art. 6, seems to indicate that at the period to which that code belongs there were only 8 dacres in the last.

Frequent remissions of the duty on wool, which occur on the credit side of the accounts, make it clear that the great custom on wool was 6s. 8d., or half a mark, the sack ;[1] and the customs accounts of Aberdeen of August 1343 for the first time inform us directly that the (single) rate of customs for woolfells was 3s. 4d. on the hundred, and for hides a mark on the last.[2] These rates, when applied to the customs accounts of the years 1328 and 1329, in some cases bring out the exact amount of duty returned. In other instances, however, the sum-total is materially larger than the tariff would warrant, the excess being most marked in the accounts of Berwick. The most probable explanation of the discrepancy seems to be that the usage had already begun, which the rolls show to have been in operation a few years later, of exacting a higher rate of custom from foreign merchants. That there were occasional irregularities in the charges made by the custumars is probable enough: but as these officers were generally among the principal citizens of their respective burghs, it is not conceivable that they should habitually defraud their fellow-burghers in the interests of the Crown. Any fraud committed by them in their own interests would, of course, not appear in the accounts.

[2] Page 529. This tariff is the same that was imposed in England by Edward First's Parliament of 1275, except as to woolfells, on which the English custom was half a mark for the three hundred. —Hale on Customs, pp. 147, 154; Stubbs' Constitutional History of England, vol. ii. p. 523. When the rates in question were introduced in Scotland we do not know; but for some years after these records begin, the custumars are designed "Collectores nove custume," an expression which gradually disppears; and when the tariff is raised to obtain money for David's ransom, the above rates are distinguished as the "custuma antiqua."

In 1327 the custumars of ten burghs accounted for £1851, 14s. 4¾d. of customs. The customs of Berwick amounted to £673, 0s. 2½d.,[1] those of Edinburgh to £439, 3s. 9d.,[2] of Aberdeen to £349, 10s. 4d.,[3] of Dundee to £240, 4s. 8½d.,[4] of Perth to £108, 1s. 9d.,[5] of Linlithgow to £14, 9s. 1d.,[6] of Cupar-Fife to £13, 6s. 0¾d.,[7] of Inverkeithing to £8, 2s. 10d.,[8] of Ayr to £3, 4s.,[9] and of Stirling to £2, 11s. 8d.[10] From Dumbarton, Wigtown, and Kirkcudbright the returns were generally small, and there are none for that year. A few years later the auditors remark on the absence for a long time past of customs accounts from Dumfries[11] and from Banff.[12]

Merchandise liable to custom could not be legally exported without a cocket, that is, a certificate under the seal of the proper officer that the great custom had been paid on it; and every burgh of export had its cocket seal and cocket clerk. One of the items of expenditure in the Chamberlain's account of 1328 is the making of a cocket (that is, a cocket seal) for the burgh of Tarbert.[13] Lords of regality, lay or spiritual, who owned burghs of export, had generally the grant of a cocket, which entitled them to the great custom of that port, and consequently to export merchandise duty free. The Abbot of Arbroath had, in 1357, the right confirmed to him of a cocket at Arbroath.[1] When goods were shipped at one port under the cocket of another, they were included in the articles charged for, but the cocket appeared on the credit side of the account; and we find the custumars of Berwick, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and Perth crediting themselves, on various occasions, with cockets, not only of the royal burghs of Linlithgow, Inverkeithing, Stirling, Cupar, and Tarbert, but of the Earl of Moray's burgh of Lochmaben, and of the church burgh of Dunfermline.[2] On the same side of the customs' accounts there also appear remissions of great customs and royal gifts of the great custom on so many sacks of wool,[3] payments made in virtue of annuities,[4] gifts by the King to his old adherents,[5] and other occasional payments similar

The chief event of the closing years of Bruce's reign was the establishment of peace with England. For fourteen years after Bannockburn a succession of invasions, sieges, and border raids served to keep both countries in an unsettled state. Edward II., unable to crush Scotland by force of arms, sought to effect the same purpose through the intervention of the Church. At his instigation the Pope withheld the title of King from Bruce, and placed him and his adherents under an interdict; but Randolph's masterly diplomacy to a great extent disarmed this weapon. War broke out afresh on the accession of Edward III., when the valour and skill of the Scottish leaders carried the day. England became at length seriously desirous of peace; and, as a necessary basis of negotiation, Edward, at a Parliament held at York on the 1st of March 1327-8, renounced his claim of feudal superiority, and acknowledged Robert to be king of Scotland. The Scottish Parliament was then sitting in Edinburgh, and five commissioners appointed by Edward proceeded thither. An indenture bearing date 17th March 1327-8 was drawn up between King Robert and the English plenipotentiaries, of which the following were the chief stipulations:—A marriage was, as soon as possible, to be solemnised between David, eldest son and heir of the King of Scotland, and Joanna, sister of the King of England. The English princess was to receive from the King of Scots lands of the yearly value of £2000 as dowry. She was to come to Berwick-on-Tweed on the 15th of July next, and to be handed over to the King of Scots, or to commissioners appointed by him. The King of England was to aid in obtaining the recall of any suits instituted by the Pope's authority against Scotland. The Scots were to pay to the King of England £20,000 in the space of three years, by three termly payments, made at Tweedmouth, in respect to which payments the Scottish King, his prelates, and other subjects were to grant a public instrument submitting themselves to the Pope's jurisdiction; but the Papal Courts were not to pronounce any sentence against the King of Scots until two months had elapsed from the last of the three terms. The transaction was confirmed by Edward at the Parliament which met in the succeeding May at Northampton, by a charter which, like the indenture on which it proceeded, was in French. Both the Scottish duplicate of the indenture and Edward's charter, of date 4th May 1328, are in the General Register House.

Contemporaneously with this charter another was granted by Edward at Northampton, also bearing to proceed on an indenture between King Robert and Edward's commissioners, executed at Edinburgh the 17th of March previously. It is in Latin, and its tenor is entirely different from the agreement above described. It stipulates, in the first place, that the King of Scots shall pay to Edward £100,000 at Michaelmas next, and, failing his doing so, the instrument by which Edward has renounced his feudal superiority is to be null and void, and to be returned to the King of England, the obligation to pay the £100,000 being at the same time cancelled. It provides in the next place that if the marriage between David and Joanna should take place within six months after they have attained a marriageable age, or if it should fail to take place from David's dissent, or any other act of his, or if they should be enabled to marry at any time before they have attained marriageable years, the obligation to pay the £100,000 shall become cancelled, and yet Edward's renunciation of feudal superiority is to have full effect.

The £100,000 seems to have been a penal sum, inserted as a pledge for the good faith of Scotland; and as the wedding took place before Michaelmas 1328, the obligation to pay it never came into effect.[1] There are not wanting indications that the

[1] Neither the original charter nor the indenture is in existence. A copy of the charter is to be found in "The Black Book," a MS. collection of early charters and State papers which was transferred from the State Paper Office in London to the custody of the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland in 1793, and has been recognised by the Court of Session as an original record, though Mr. Dickson, the present Curator of the Historical Department of the General Register House, whose opinion on such a matter carries immediate marriage of the two royal children was looked on as a settled affair months before the adjustment of the treaty.[1]

It is clear from various public instruments that other stipulations were entered into as conditions of peace besides those contained in these two charters; more particularly, that St. John the Baptist's Day (15th July), in the years 1329, 1330, and 1331, were to be three terms of payment of the £30,000;[2] that the possessions of churchmen on both sides were to be restored;[3] that Sir James Douglas was to be put in possession of the lands which he had forfeited in Northumberland;[4] and that Henry Percy, Thomas Lord Wake of Liddell, and Henry of Beaumont were to be restored to their lands and lordships in Scotland.[5]

Incidental references to the Parliament of March 1327-8 occur in the accounts. The Chamberlain gives account of meal and barley supplied by him,[6] with it great weight, doubts whether it originally possessed that character. The charter is printed in the Record edition of the Fœdera (vol. ii. p. 734), and so much of it as narrates the indenture in the Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, vol. i. p. 486.

[1] It is difficult to avoid looking at the payment of £16, 7s. 4d. by the custumars of Dundee before the end of 1327 to a merchant of Bruges "pro vario colore" for painting the King's chamber in the castle of Berwick (p. 77) as anticipatory of that event; and in the account of the provosts of Edinburgh, audited in January 1327-8, there are remissions of petty custom to Peter the machinist, to such an amount as to show that his commission to purchase articles for the wedding must have been executed in 1327 (p. 74).

and acknowledges receipt of what had remained undrunk of the wine provided.[1] Prince David, not yet five years old, was present.[2] The proceedings must have included arrangements for the drain which the payment of the English indemnity would make on the resources of Scotland; and we gather from a roll in which twelve of the sheriffs, with the bailies of Crail and Kinross, give account of the payments received by them at Whitsunday 1328 towards the "contribucio pro pace,"[3] that it was to be levied within their respective ballie for three successive years at the same rate as the aid granted to the King in the previous year, namely, according to the tenth penny, old extent, of the rents;[4] and the accounts show that here also occasional departures from the old extent were sanctioned where that valuation had become an obviously unfair index of the relative value of the lands.[5]

[4] In Mr. Thomson's paper on old extent above alluded to, the words "juxta oneracionem decimi denarii alias domino regi concessi" (p. 103), are interpreted as meaning a diversion of the tenth penny already granted to the King to the purpose of paying the stipulated £20,000 to England. But there can be no doubt that the explanation adopted in the text is the correct one. This is sufficiently shown by the only accounts of sheriffs or ballivi ad extra of that period that have been preserved — those of the sheriff of Dumbarton and the bailie of Carrick (pp. 257, 258). In these both the King's tenth penny and the tenth penny for the contribution are returned, payment being made out of the King's aid in the one case of £10, 10s. to Malcolm of Luss, and in the other of three terms of the impost to the Abbot of Crossraguel. In the burghs too, the accounts leave no room for doubt that the one tax was independent of and additional to the other.

[5] Thus the sheriff of Stirling debits himself with a sum "juxta

The mode in which the burghs were taxed is not so obvious. In addition to the King's tenth penny, which appeared in the accounts of the provosts as long as King Robert lived, we find at the audit of June 1328 thirteen of the burghs returning another tenth penny for the contribution. Doubts however were expressed—it is not distinctly said whether by the provosts or the auditors—whether this second tenth penny was really due. The matter was referred to the King,[1] and in the only two cases where the provosts had actually paid it, it was refunded to them at the next year's audit.[2] But this by no means meant that the burgesses were to be exempted from the national burden; for at the same audit at which this question of liability had been raised, the Chamberlain charged himself with the round sum of 500 marks, or £333, 6s. 8d., received from the burgesses as their past year's share of the contribution,[3] an decimum denarium, deductis quibusdam decidenciis" (p. 105), and the King's farmers in the same sheriffdom pay according to the old extent everywhere, "except in Bothkennar" (ibid.) The sheriff of Roxburgh charges himself nothing in respect of the contribution of Cavertoun "quia nondum extenditur" (p. 106). In the following year we find the sheriff of Dumbarton charging himself with the "redditus assise" of Kilmaronock and of Inchmannock (p. 257).

[1] Pages 84 et seq.

[2] Pages 155 et seq.

[3] Page 113. A contribution of only £1000 by the burghs towards a national burden of £20,000 does not accord with the proportions in which taxes were afterwards levied from the three estates of the realm. For the ransom of David II. the estates were taxed in the proportion of one-half from the barons, three-tenths from the clergy, and one-fifth from the burghs; and in the imposts of later times two-fifths came amount exceeding what we have seen to be at that time the tenth of the actual fermes of the burghs. How this sum was collected we do not know; one must suppose there was an arrangement that the burghs were to contribute 1500 marks by three termly instalments; and the question referred to the King seems to have been, whether, over and above this, they should pay a second tenth penny. The whole receipts acknowledged by the Chamberlain on behalf of the contribution in June 1328 were £1714,[1] a sum which, besides the 500 marks of the burghs, included from the Sheriffs only the few accounts above adverted to, and nothing at all from the clergy.

In the second year the Abbot of Dunfermline, who is designed depositary of the money for the contribution,[2] received £1399, 7s. 9d. from the sheriffs, and £1787, 6s. 2d. from the churchmen, in all £3186, 13s. 11d., of which amount a portion was handed to Reginald More for the purpose of advancing the interests of the realm "ad curiam Romanam."[3] But the sums paid the Abbot were only a portion of the second year's receipts from the shires; for the Chamberlain at the same audit charges himself with a further £3818, 8s. 9d. received from the sheriffs,[4] and £76, 1s. 9d. from the clergy.[5] The contribution of the burgesses for the second year, also paid directly to the Chamberlain, was, as before, £333, 6s. 8d.[1]

At the audit of 1330 a separate account regarding the contribution had been rendered by the Chamberlain, which is no longer extant. That such was the case is shown by the ordinary account of that officer, in which his expenditure exceeds his receipts by £3968, 9s. 10d., and the balance is said to be effected by allowing him that sum in his account "de contribucione."[2] £1988, 16s. 1d. of arrears of this account appear in the Chamberlain's ordinary account in the next year (1331), with some smaller arrears from the clergy, the sheriffs, and the Earl of Moray.[3]

Edward had at Whitsunday 1329 so far relaxed the original agreement as to accept of 5000 marks only on St. John's Day of that year, payment of the other 5000 being deferred to the Martinmas following;[4] and the accounts accordingly instruct the payment of the first 5000 marks, or £3333, 6s. 8d., to Edward's commissioners at Berwick on St. John's Day 1329.[5] That a second 5000 marks were paid at Martinmas 1329, and 10,000 marks on St. John's Day 1330, we learn from the discharges printed in the Fœdera.[6] In the Chamberlain's account for

1331 we have a record of the payment of the third and last instalment, £666, 13s. 4d., with £200 in name of damages for the delay in paying the first; and the obligations for the debt being delivered up were torn and cancelled—"dilacerate et adnichillate"—at the Parliament held coincidently with David's coronation.[1] This last instalment had been paid to the Florentine Society of the Bardi, who at that time farmed all the customs of England for £40 a day, and had had this debt assigned them by Edward.[2]

Our account of the produce of the tax is, as has been seen, imperfect; but it would appear that the sum collected was not quite sufficient to meet the emergency. No doubt the receipts of the second year, of which alone we have a full account, exceeded a third of the debt to England;[3] but they included a large arrear of the first year;[4] and it has been already seen that part of the money collected by the Abbot of Dunfermline went to the Papal Court, and that Reginald More was allowed to set off his own surplus expenditure as Chamberlain against the money collected by him for the tax. It seems to have been with the aid of loans that the country was enabled to fulfil the obligations of the treaty. Contemporaneously with the payment of the last instalment of the debt, mention is made of two loans of 1000 marks each from the Papal nuncios,[1] of a loan from the lord of Douglas of £933, 6s. 8d., and of £400 from the Pope, to make up for a similar sum due by Douglas for the entry of his lands.[2]

[4] In January 1329-30, Sir Malcolm Fleming, both as sheriff of Dumbarton and as bailie of Carrick, accounts at once for four terms of the contribution. That the first year's proceeds had come in tardily further appears from the difficulty experienced in paying more than half the stipulated sum on the first of the stipulated terms, St. John's Day 1329.

Besides the £20,000 paid to satisfy England's claims, money was required for another purpose—the

[1] Page 403.

[2] Page 396. The designation "Willelmus dominus de Douglas" is certainly erroneous as to the Christian name. Sir James had recently died in Spain on his way to Palestine with the heart of Bruce, and his brother and successor was Hugh lord of Douglas. William, afterwards first Earl of Douglas, was at that time only a youth with two, if not three, between him and the succession, namely, his uncle Hugh, his father Archibald, afterwards Regent, and probably also an elder brother John, who is said by Wyntoun (l. 6380 to have died in foreign parts. No doubt there was then another William of Douglas, generally known as the "knight of Liddesdale;" but he cannot be meant, both because he could not with any propriety have been designed "lord of Douglas," and because he had, before King Robert's death, been entered to his lands as heir of his father Sir James Douglas of Lothian (Robertson's Index, p. 23, no. 8).

It may here be remarked that in the otherwise satisfactory proof in the late Mr. John Riddell's "Stewartiana" (page 137) of the true descent of the "Knight of Liddesdale," that eminent genealogical antiquary seems to have overlooked the fact of Sir James Douglas of Lothian having died before David's accession. The designation "younger," appended in a charter of David to the name of Sir William of Liddesdale, and supposed by Mr. Riddell to have been given to distinguish him from his father, seems really to have been the way in which he was currently distinguished from his natural brother of the same name. Bower expressly gives the designation of "elder" to the Knight of Liddesdale's bastard brother (Scotichronicon, xiii. 47), and he appears in the English muniments connected with the prisoners taken at Durham as "Willelmus Douglas l'eisne" (Fœdera, iii. 95).

recall of the excommunication under which the King and people of Scotland still lay. This was doubtless the chief object of the frequent missions to the Roman Court, that is, to Avignon, between the Treaty of Northampton and 1331. The proceedings there were costly. Four thousand marks were named as their necessary expense,[1] a sum which, as we have seen, came in part at least out of the "contribucio pro pace." John Pilmore, Bishop of Moray, son of a burgess of Dundee,[2] and Adam of Moray, Bishop of Brechin, seem to have been the principal ambassadors employed in the negotiation; and payments of £400 and £333, 6s. 8d. appear in the accounts of the Chamberlain for their expenses, and the objects of their mission.[3] We also find, early in 1330, a payment of £60 to Richard of Ballergous, a monk, passing to foreign parts on the affairs of the King and kingdom;[4] and one "Magister Reynerus Jacobus de Podio Bonici," most probably an ecclesiastic from Poggibonsi, near Siena, is called procurator for King Robert at the Court of Rome, for which office he drew twenty marks, till provided with a benefice, a salary continued to him under David II.[5] The result of these missions to Avignon was the release of Scotland from the interdict, and the procuring of a Bull from Pope John XXII., dated a few days before the death of King Robert, empowering the Bishop of St. Andrews, and failing him the Bishop of Glasgow, to anoint and crown the kings of Scotland.[1]

In the meantime another important condition of the treaty was fulfilled. The heir-apparent, who had been made Earl of Carrick, set out with a large retinue from Cardross to meet his bride. We trace him at Lanark and Wedale,[2] and before the wedding he seems to have paid a visit to Coldingham.[3] At Berwick, the King of England's sister was handed over, in terms of the treaty, to the Earl of Moray and Sir James Douglas, as representatives of King Robert, himself too infirm to be present; and on the 18th the wedding was celebrated with great public rejoicings. Of the expenditure on the occasion we get some idea from the account of the Chamberlain, rendered in June 1328, and that of the Clerk of Liverance of the following years. Two different missions were sent to foreign

[1] This Bull, which is now in the Advocates' Library, has been facsimiled in Part ii. of the National Manuscripts of Scotland, and is also printed in Theiner's "Vetera Monumenta," page 244. Another Bull of the same Pope, of date 9th November 1330, which is among the archives of the General Register House, and is printed as No. II. of the Appendix to this Preface, acknowledges receipt from David II. of 12,000 florins of gold, as the equivalent of £2000 which his father had bound himself to pay to the Pope. The sum in question was paid in two instalments, the first by the Society of the Bardi, the second by the Bishop of Moray and the Chancellor.

parts to procure some of the necessaries for the marriage festivities. One of these was intrusted to Peter the machinist (Petrus machinarum), a Flemish trader in Berwick, whose name is of frequent occurrence in the rolls. The detailed account of the purchases which he made, and for which he was authorised to charge a commission of two shillings in the pound, contains one of the earliest lists in the records of what are known under the generic name of "wardrobe articles," a designation which includes not only cloths, silks, and furs, but spices and aromatics.[1] These two classes of articles were habitually imported together; and enumerations of them, sometimes for special occasions, like David's coronation, and sometimes in smaller quantities for the ordinary consumption of the Royal household, occur from time to time in the accounts of the Chamberlain, and the Clerks of the Wardrobe, the Steward of the King's household and of the household of the Earl of Carrick, and also in the accounts of the provosts of Perth. This enumeration begins, as usual, with woollen cloth coloured (panni coloris) and striped (panni de radiato), twenty-three pieces of each kind being supplied for the knights, costing together £173, 9s. 2d. For esquires there are twenty pieces of cloth and sixteen for officers (seriandi) costing £90. We have "supertunice" and "capucia"[2] of various descriptions of fur, vair, miniver, squirrelles, and strandling,[1] and also of budge, that is, the dressed skins of lambs or kids. A very large supply of canvas, linen, napery, and towelling follows, articles for whose production the Low Countries had then a great reputation.[2] Of dried fruits, spices, and similar articles, at the time largely brought from the East to the markets of Europe by Venetian and Genoese traders, there were 4360 lbs. of almonds, 600 lbs. of rice, 40 loaves of sugar, together weighing 378 lbs., 180 lbs. of pepper, 55 of mace, besides gelofer, nutmegs, grains of Paris, cicovalens, spikenard, colour for food, canella, galingal, saffron, coarse sugar for the kitchen in barrels, cummin, ginger, and dregy.[3] Next come 200 stones of wax, 20 tuns of wine, costing £75, vinegar, verjuice, olive which both words are sometimes used makes their signification a little uncertain. Thus among the articles supplied for Robert Bruce's funeral we have the entry, for three gowns of the King, six supertunice and six capucia of miniver (page 255).

[1] Two other furs whose names often occur in lists of this kind are "gris" and "popre." Some account of these several furs, with an attempt to identify the animals to which they belonged, will be found in Mr. Dickson's Preface to vol. i. of the Accounts of the High Treasurers of Scotland, p. clxxxvii, note.

[2] Silks and velvets are wanting; they would probably be among the purchases made by Thomas of Charteris, of which we have no note.

[3] Among other articles which occur in lists of the same kind are dates, figs from Malaga, currants and raisins in baskets (copule), preserves (confectiones), gingebrace, cubebs, carraways, and sandalwood (sandery). "A great portion of the sugar and aromatic spices then imported were used for mixing with wine, which was generally practised on account of the comparatively harsh and acid quality of the wines of the period." —Preface to vol. i. of Accounts of the High Treasurers of Scotland, p. ccix.

oil, honey, mustard, white peas, and 2200 eels, in seven barrels. Lastly, we have a collection of kitchen utensils,—great kettles, large pans, great brazen pots, and large gridirons, whose price amounted to £20, 2s. The whole cost of Peter the machinist's purchases, including his commission, was £941, 0s. 6d. A separate payment of £21, 1s. 3d. for freight of these goods,[1] occurs in the Chamberlain's account of 1329, from which it also appears that Peter brought over a second supply, for which, calculating by the commission which he received, £130 must have been paid.[2]

A separate mission to Flanders, to make purchases for the marriage, was committed to Thomas of Charteris,[3] for which £400 were paid him, but the King, by a letter expressive of his satisfaction with the fidelity with which he had discharged the trust committed to him, exempted him from audit,[4] and we have therefore no account of his expenditure of that sum. The account of his expenses however was audited: and among purchases not coming under his commission, and therefore appearing in the accounts, were a gold seal and silver-gilt chain for King Robert, and a silver seal and chain for David, costing together £28, 16s.[5]

Large sums were on this occasion handed over by the Chamberlain, and by some of the sheriffs and provosts, to John of Dunfermline, the Clerk of Liverance of the royal household.[1] His account, rendered soon after King Robert's death, is remarkable for the startling way in which purchases for the marriage alternate in it with purchases for the King's funeral. In connection with the wedding, credit is taken for £966, 10s. 10d., outlay in money,[2] besides large quantities of oats and malt, 50 tuns of wine, 171 marts and 413 sheep, lampreys, sturgeon, salt, coals, etc.[3] Sir Alexander Seton, Governor of Berwick,[4] and for a time Steward of the household of the Earl of Carrick,[5] had £90, 13s. 4d. intrusted to him to be spent on this occasion,[6] and £13, 1s. 8d. was expended on the castle of Berwick by Michael of Angus.[7]

After the close of the wedding festivities Simon of Salton remained behind at Berwick to look after the unconsumed remains of the provisions; and with the aid of a cooper had six tuns of wine and a large supply of victuals conveyed from the castle to the shore, and sent by water to Stirling, Clackmannan, and Leith.[8] We find the Earl of Carrick's Steward of the household acknowledging receipt of marts, sheep, and malt sent him from the residue of the "providencia Berwici."[9] The cooks were paid £25, 6s. 8d.;[10] and the minstrels got a fee of no less than £66, 15s. 4d.[11]

In some unexplained way the walls of the churchyard of the Holy Trinity at Berwick had been thrown down at the time of the wedding: and a charge of 13s. 4d. is entered for repairing them.[1] The Earl of Carrick or his people had involuntarily done some injury to a poor woman on their return from Berwick, for which ten bolls of barley were given her by way of compensation.[2]

The year of the marriage of King Robert's son and heir was also, Fordun informs us, the year of the death of the King's faithful and attached friend, Bishop Lamberton of St. Andrews; and during a year that the see remained vacant, its revenues were assigned to the young Earl and Countess of Carrick. The mention of repairing and putting in order the episcopal manor of Inchmorthach[3] appears to indicate that they took up their residence there for a time; but they seem to have also spent part of their first year of married life at Turnberry, where building operations went on, and a park was enclosed.[4] Sir David of Barclay, and afterwards Sir Alexander Seton, were Stewards of the Earl's household, and their accounts[5] show large purchases of "wardrobe articles." The Prince had also a Clerk of Liverance, a Clerk of Audit, and a Clerk of the Wardrobe of his own,[1] and his household and that of his consort further included Sir Robert Toynge as Treasurer, Sir Malcolm Fleming, who succeeded Sir Alexander Seton in the office of Steward of Carrick, his wife Lady Marjory, Lady Burga de Vaus, five ladies (domicelle) of the Countess and two of the Lady Marjory, five soldiers, nine chaplains and clerics, thirty-eight esquires, four boys, three laundresses, thirty-six sergeants, two lardinarii, twenty sumpter grooms, and a page of the Countess.[2] Payments occur of twenty shillings to a fiddler (vieillario) by gift of the Countess, and of 66s. 8d. to minstrels at Christmas.[3]

An illness brought on by the hardships which he had undergone in early life so enfeebled King Robert Bruce in his later years that he was unable for active exertion, and he spent much of his time at Cardross, a manor on the Clyde which he had acquired in 1326 in exchange for the lands of Old Montrose, bestowed on his faithful adherent, Sir David Graham.[4] The account rendered by

The King also obtained from Sir David Graham the islands of Inchcailleach and Inchfad, in Loch Lomond, in exchange for other lands; and from another of his comrades in arms, Malcolm Earl of Lennox, he acquired two ploughgates of land at Cardross in exchange for half the lands of Leckie (Reg. Mag. Sig. 17). Inchcailleach and Inchfad, with the King's coble at Cardross, were after King Robert's death let to

Adam son of Alan, Constable of Cardross,[1] is valuable for its picture of the occupations and interests of the King in the decline of life. The already noticed Tarbert account contained an entry regarding great boards for repair of the park at Cardross;[2] and here we have the details of the building operations going on there, including a new chamber and a stone wall surrounding it, and specifying the cost of the scaffolding used and of the glasswork inserted in the windows.[3] We have payments for garden seeds, and a gardener's wages.[4] A house for the royal falcons is repaired, roofed, and surrounded by a hedge at a cost of two shillings.[5] The wages of the park-keeper, the girnalman, the huntsman, and the keeper of the manor, with those of the carpenter and other workpeople, are given with great minuteness.[6] That the King still lived in hospitable style is clear from the large provision of marts, sheep, salted salmon, haddocks, eels, and lampreys made for the larder.[7] We have notices of gifts to the Countess of Lennox, James of Menteith,[8] and other persons, including a mason, a miller, and a merchant of Ireland;[9] also charities to poor men. Eighteenpence are paid for the expenses of men who accompanied Patrick the fool from England to Tarbert.[10]

The Earl of Moray was often with the King, and both devoted much of their attention to ship-building. At one time the King's great ship is hauled from the shore to the river adjoining the manor, and the sails deposited in the manor of Cardross ;[1] at another, John son of Gun, and nine men with him, are sent with the rigging to Tarbert ; at another twelve men of Dumbarton are sent to bring the ship back from Tarbert ;[2] and there are payments for sails, pitch, iron, grease, and other necessaries, some of them attested by the Earl of Moray.[3] The great ship continues to appear in the accounts for some time after the King's death, the keeper of it getting his salary in 1330.[4]

Various references occur in the accounts to a lion, which appears to have been a pet of the warrior king. Its food for a year cost £6, 13s. 4d.[5] The custumars of Perth in 1330 and 1331 paid for the hire of a house for it,[6] and for wages to its keeper, and in the last-named year got a cage for it, which cost 23s.[7]

King Robert died on the 9th of June 1329, less than eleven months after the marriage of his son. His growing weakness is indicated by the recurrence of entries regarding physicians and apothecaries ;[8] though four large payments, succeeding each other in 1329, to John the apothecary,[1] amounting in all to £37, 6s. 8d., may be partly connected with the embalming of the body and removing of the heart after death. The accounts enable us to follow his remains from Cardross, by way of Dunipace and Cambuskenneth,[2] to their resting-place in front of the high altar of the abbey church of Dunfermline. A marble monument made in Paris was erected over the grave, and the entries regarding it show that it had been commissioned in the King's lifetime. In the Chamberlain's account ending in August 1329, one Richard Barber[3] was paid tually the capital. His physician, "Magister Mavinus," resided there in the house of John Aylebot; and Aylebot, after the King's death, got compensation from the Chamberlain for his dwelling having been occupied in this way for two years. Pages 169, 238.

[3] This surname, occurring in such a connection, not unnaturally suggests the metrical biographer of Bruce, who tells us that—

"With great far and solemnite
They hef him had to Dunfermlyn,
And him solemnly erdit syne
In ane far tumb within the quer."

Of the parentage of the Archdeacon of Aberdeen nothing is known, and it would perhaps be allowing imagination too much play to connect the warm and loving interest which he takes in his hero with the possibility of his being a son or other relative of this Richard Barber. The name of Archdeacon Barbour occurs in the Exchequer Rolls of the reign of Robert II. as holding the position of Clerk of Audit, and in the enjoyment of substantial marks of royal favour.

Various other persons designated Barber, or "Barbitonsor," are mentioned in this volume, and it may be here remarked that, with this and other appellations derived from a calling or office, such as Cissor, Faber, Falconarius, Clericus, De Camera, De Dispensa, it is not always easy to say whether an occupation is meant, or whether the word has assumed, or—it may be—is in process of assuming, the character of a hereditary surname. In printing a record like this, the custom of distinguishing proper names by a large initial letter makes the question a practical one; and perhaps in some cases, where a small initial has been adopted, there may be room for difference of opinion whether a capital would not have been better.

£13, 6s. 8d., "de anno precedenti pro dictis tumbis,"[1] and there is a payment of £66, 13s. 4d. to Thomas of Charteris, who seems to have had the principal charge connected with it. The workman of the tomb was paid £12, 10s. for its freight and his expenses in bringing it from Paris via Bruges to Dunfermline,[3] and the mason got £38, 2s., in which sum a gratuity from the Regent was included.[4] The tomb was surrounded with an iron railing,[5] and large purchases of gold-leaf were made for its decoration, partly at Newcastle and York.[6] A chapel of Baltic timber (bordis de Estland) was erected over the grave on the day of the funeral ;[7] and John of Lithgow, the painter, employed in gilding and

Names like John of Roxburgh, John of Renfrew, and Roger of Irvine, which may in some cases only indicate inhabitancy of a particular town, it has been thought better in the Index to treat as if they were true surnames. The same rule has been followed with patronymics, though it would be rash to assume that such designations of burgesses as Adam son of Alan, William son of John, or John son of Thomas, had in all or most cases the fixed character of a surname.

Fragments of cloth of fine linen, with a gold thread running through it, surrounded the body, and the breast-bone was found to have been sawn in two in order to remove the heart. Near the tomb were found numerous fragments of white and black marble, well polished, carved, and gilt, the remains of the monument, which had been demolished at the destruction of the Abbey. A few similar fragments had years before been found near the same spot, and deposited in the Museum of the Society of Antiquaries, in the belief that they belonged to the tomb of Malcolm Canmore. On one of them is a small crowned head, not unlike the heads on the coins of King Robert.—Archæologia Scotica, vol. ii. p. 435.

decorating it, rendered an account of his wages and expenses,[1] in addition to which he had a gift of £3, 6s. 8d.[2] £66, 13s. 4d. was paid to the Abbot,[3] and 562 stones 5 lbs. of wax were bought for candles,[4] which were prepared by the Abbot's servants.[5] We have charges for vestments for the altar and the gilding of a hearse,[6] and horses for the litter.[7] The purchases further included large quantities of lawn,[8] of crape (nigri cindonis),[9] black persic,[10] and cloth for robes for the Steward and his people[11] and furs for the knights.[12] Offerings were made on the day of the funeral of £66, 13s. 4d. to the Abbot of Dunfermline—a sum agreed on beforehand—and £20 to the rector of Cardross.[13]

As might be expected, there are various payments made, sometimes in money, sometimes in grain, "pro anima regis defuncti."[14] £14 had previously been in use to be paid out of the fermes of Ayr to three chaplains in the church of that town; and in the accounts after this date the sum is said to be paid them to say masses for the soul of King Robert.[15]

Bruce's Queen and second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Richard de Burgh, Earl of Ulster, had predeceased him in November 1327. Her body was embalmed at Cullen, where she died, and buried at Dunfermline.[1] Incidental notices of her occur,[2] and there is an enumeration of the legacies which she bequeathed to her retainers.[3] The King founded a chaplainry at Cullen, "to pray for the soule of Elizabeth his spouse, quene of Scottis, quhilk deceassit in our said burgh of Culane, and hir bowallis erdit in oure Lady Kirk thairof;"[4] and the yearly payment in the accounts of the burgh of Cullen to the chaplain celebrating for her soul has been already alluded to.[5] She had been married to Bruce when he was a courtier of Edward, and came with him to Scotland to share his fortunes. Along with Marjory her stepdaughter, she was carried a prisoner to England after the battle of Methven; and both remained in captivity till after Bannockburn. Her father, known as the Red Earl of Ulster, was the most powerful subject of the English Crown in Ireland, and conducted the war there against Edward Bruce, his son-in-law's brother. After the treaty of Northampton, one of whose provisions was that the Scots should not aid the King of England's enemies in Ireland, we find King Robert on good terms with his wife's nephew, the then Earl of Ulster, and sending him a present of 200 hard fish;[6] and the rolls contain indications of the existence of friendly intercourse between Scotland and Ireland in 1328 and 1329.[1]

Elizabeth had been more than twenty years married before the birth of her son David.[2] She had also a second son, John, who died in childhood, and was buried at Restennet.[3] The rolls corroborate Fordun's statement, that there were two, and only two, daughters of Bruce's second marriage, Matilda and Margaret, of whom Matilda was the elder.[4] Both were doubtless older than David, though neither can have been born before 1316.[5] After their father's death they seem to have resided in family with David and his Queen at Cardross. Between 1329 and 1343 the accounts of the Chamberlain contain various entries con-

[2] David was born 5th March 1323-4. Among the events of 1325 Fordun gives the birth of David as having taken place "on Monday, 5th March, in the first week of Lent, in the monastery of Dunfermline after complines;" but the 5th of March was neither Monday nor in the first week of Lent in 1325-6, though it was so in 1323-4. David's birth is assigned to the last-named year by Wyntoun (viii. c. 22), Bower (Scotichronicon, ii. c. 5), and the court poets quoted by Bower.

[3] The Prior and Canons of Restennet got a grant of 20 marks out of the great customs of Dundee in 1344 in consideration of the King's "brother-german" John, "celebris memoriæ," having been buried there (page 614; Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, i. 514). He must have been younger than David, else his birth would have been too important a national event to escape the notice of historians. Had he survived infancy, his name would, like those of his sisters, have appeared in the extant Exchequer accounts.

[5] The terms of the settlement of the crown in April 1315, in which Edward Bruce was preferred to Marjory, imply that Marjory was the King's only lawful child; and had there been any immediate prospect of issue by the Queen, that circumstance could hardly fail to have been directly alluded to.

nected with their dress and expenses.[1] In 1342 the Queen and the King's sisters are recorded to have had clothes made for them at Aberdeen, for which their tailor was paid forty shillings by the custumars of that burgh,[2] an entry which, taken in combination with that of a payment by the provosts of Banff for the expenses of the King, the Queen, and the King's sisters spending a night at Banff,[3] seems to show that both ladies were still single in the end of 1342. Of the elder of the two Fordun says, rather significantly, "De Matilde penitus taceo, quia nihil dignum egit memoria;"[4] and in noticing her death, which occurred at Aberdeen on the festival of St. Margaret, 1353, he says, "Nupsit cuidem armigero, nomine Thomæ·Ysaac."[5] In the Chamberlain's account of 1342 a payment occurs of £6, 13s. 4d., an annual fee to Thomas, son of Ysak, till otherwise provided;[6] and in the account of the Sheriff of Aberdeen, rendered March 1358-9, after the lady Matilda's death, half of the thanages of Fermartin and Kintore are said to be in the hands of the Earl of Sutherland (husband of her sister Margaret), and the other half in those of Thomas Ysak, "ex gracia regis, super quo," add the auditors, "consulatur rex."[7] Regarding this singular mésalliance the late erudite genealogical antiquary Mr. Alexander Sinclair remarks,

"The name was not so low as it seemed. It was disguised into Ysac, Ysaac, and de Yssac to make it appear noble. . . . This individual had not long after his name borne by gentry bearing the same name with coat armour in the south of England. Margaret, the younger daughter of Robert Bruce's second marriage, married William Earl of Sutherland; and David II. granted a charter on 10th November 1345 to her and her husband, and the heirs to be procreated between them, of the earldom of Sutherland, erected into a regality. On the strength of the title in Robertson's Index of a charter "to Robert Glen and Margaret Bruce, the King's sister, of the lands of Nether Pittedye in schira de Kinghorn,"[1] it has been asserted that Margaret was widow of Robert Glen when she married the Earl of Sutherland;[2] but as she was unmarried in 1343, and Countess of Sutherland in 1345, there was no time for such prior marriage, about which Fordun is entirely silent.[3]

[1] Herald and Genealogist, vol. vi. page 594. There is certainly no ground for the identification attempted in Kennedy's Annals of Aberdeen (vol. i. p. 31, note) of Matilda's husband with "Isaac Clericus," a burgess and bailie of Aberdeen, whose name occurs in the Aberdeen Chartulary (vol. i. pp. 41, 54, 71). The issue of the marriage of Matilda Bruce with Thomas Ysaac was two daughters, of whom the elder married John of Lorn, and the younger died single (Fordun, Annal. clxix.). Isaac the bailie, on the other hand, is shown by the records of Aberdeen to have had a son "Alexander, dictus Ysaac," who inherited an annual-rent from his father, and conveyed it to John of Edenham in 1350; eight years after which date Matilda's husband is proved by the above-quoted account of the Sheriff of Aberdeen to be still alive; and later accounts show that he survived till 1364 (vol. ii. p. 132). The name of "Isaac Clericus" appears in the account of the Aberdeen custumars of date 1332 (p. 427).

King Robert is well known to have had a natural son, Sir Robert Bruce, who fell at Dupplin. He had numerous charters from his father, in which he is styled "filius carissimus" and "filius dilectissimus," the lands conveyed including among others the extensive territory of Liddesdale, forfeited by the Soulis family.[4] We find him getting 100 marks from the Chamberlain in 1328, the same in 1329, and £40 in 1330, in part payment of a gift by the King of 500 marks:[5] he received £20 in 1329 in aid of the church of St. Fillan,[6] and there is a further payment to him "de veteri arreragio" in 1331.[7]

Another natural son, Walter, owned the lands of Odistown on the Clyde, and predeceased his father.[8]

Nigel of Bruce, whose name occurs between 1328 and 1331 as the recipient of a pension of £20,[9] is shown almost certainly to have been a son of the King by his appearing on one occasion under the name of Nigel of Carrick.[1] His name occurs in the Chronicles of Knyghton[2] and Walsinghame[3] among the slain at Durham.

Margaret, wife of Robert Glen, already alluded to, must have been a natural daughter of the King,[4] as also was Elizabeth, wife of Sir Walter Oliphant.[5] There are in the Gask charter-chest four charters by David II. to Walter Olyfaunt and Elizabeth his wife "dilecte sorori nostre," all bearing date the last day of February 1363-4. "Christian Bruce, the King's daughter," had, according to Robertson's Index, a charter from Robert Bruce;[6] she may perhaps be identical with Christiana of Carrick, who in the accounts of 1328 and 1329 receives a pension of £2.[7]

[4] One of the coheiresses of the Glen family married in the reign of Robert III. Sir John Boswell of Balgregie, and brought to him the estate of Balmuto; and the Boswells have since quartered a coat which has no resemblance to Glen, but has been conjectured to be Abernethy. It is blazoned, Or, a lion rampant gules debruised by a ribbon sable. No heiress or coheiress of the Abernethy family is known to have married either a Boswell or a Glen. The ribbon was in former days in general use in Scotland as a mark of bastardy; and it seems not impossible that the lion in question was originally that of the royal coat thus differenced, indicating descent from a daughter of Robert Bruce, who, if legitimate, would have been in the heraldic sense a coheiress.

[5] Among the items of expenditure in the Chamberlain's Account of 1365 (vol. ii. p. 222), are £26, 13s. 4d. for a tun of wine, presented by the King to "Elisabet Olyfaunt," and a gift to the same lady of the escheat of one William Clapham (Clephane), amounting to £3.

A few remarks may be added in correction of the currently received accounts of the brothers and sisters of Robert Bruce. The King had, as is well known, four brothers, Edward Earl of Carrick[1] and King of Ireland, who fell at Dundalk in 1318; Thomas and Alexander, made prisoners at Loch-ryan, and executed by order of Edward I. at Carlisle in 1306-7; and Nigel, "miles pulcherrime juventutis,"[2] who surrendered at Kildrummy in 1306, and was hanged and beheaded, his fate exciting universal pity and indignation. They all, Bower tells us, died without lawful issue.[3] Edward had a dispensation, dated 1st June 1317, a few months before his death, to marry Isabel, daughter of William Earl of Ross;[4] but it is not likely that the marriage ever took place. He is commonly said to have had three sons, Robert, Alexander, and Thomas, who, though illegitimate, succeeded him in the earldom of Carrick in consequence of the terms of the grant of that earldom not expressly excluding bastards.[5] In reality, the earldom of Carrick, on Edward's decease without lawful issue, reverted to the Crown, and, as has been seen, was bestowed by King Robert on the heir-apparent shortly before his marriage. David enjoyed not only the title, but the rents of the earldom, and was in possession of the manor of Turnberry down to the time of his accession to the throne.[1] Of the alleged three natural sons of Edward Bruce, Robert, who is said to have been slain at Dupplin, is imaginary. Neither in Wyntoun, Bower, the "Liber Pluscardensis," nor any of the English Chronicles, is more than one Robert Bruce alluded to as having fallen at Dupplin, namely, the natural son of the late King.[2] There is no question about the existence of Alexander Bruce, son of Edward by Isabel, sister of David Earl of Athole. He had various charters from his uncle King Robert, some of them granted in the first instance to his mother, the subjects conveyed including Balgillo and other lands in the shire of Forfar, and Mochrum in that of Wigtown.[3] He married Eleanora, sister of the first Earl of Douglas, afterwards wife of James Sandilands of Calder, fell at Halidon Hill in 1333, and was made Earl of Carrick shortly before his death.[4] That

[1] Pages 258, 259.

[2] No doubt Barnes, in his History of Edward III. (p. 60), mentions, on the authority of a MS. Chronicle, Robert Earl of Carrick as among the slain, and relates a not very probable story about him; but he distinctly calls him a bastard son, and not a nephew, of King Robert Bruce.

[3] Robertson's Index, p. 13 No. 90, p. 18 Nos. 65 and 83, p. 25 Nos. 15, 16, 17. The designation of "Isabel Countess of Athol" in one of these charters is an error, and one that has led to considerable misapprehension. In another independent MS. index, which exists in the General Register House, the lady is simply "Isabel de Atholia."

[4] When he was taken in arms against his country at Annan in 1332, Fordun calls him simply Alexander of Bruce (Annal. cxlix.), though Bower and the "Liber Pluscardensis" make him Earl of Carrick. Bower (Scotichronicon, lxiii. c. 51) relates that in 1346 a person alleging himself to be Alexander Earl of Carrick, and to have been a prisoner in Eng-

Thomas Bruce, "one of the associates of Robert the Steward, Guardian of Scotland, whom he joined with the flower of the gentry of Kyle,"[1] was a son of Edward, is perhaps matter of conjecture rather than of certainty; but he never was Earl of Carrick, nor did he "die without issue." There can indeed be no reasonable doubt that this Thomas Bruce, whose important services in organising an armed resistance to the English in 1334 are adverted to in the Scotichronicon and elsewhere,[2] whether the son of Edward or not, was the progenitor of the Clackmannan family.[3] land since Halidon, appeared in Scotland, and was convicted of imposture, and hanged at Ayr; and that, as in the case of similar impostures in our own and other times, multitudes of people continued to believe in his pretensions.

[3] Such services as his could hardly have failed of recognition by the Crown: and the account of the sheriff of Clackmannan, audited in March 1359-60, but extending over the whole period from Easter 1348, shows that he had at some time not indicated been put in possession of a large proportion of the Crown demesnes in the county of Clackmannan. He had died before 1348, from which year a third part of his lands had been in the occupation of Marjory Charteris, his widow, and the remainder in that of his son Robert, during whose minority Sir Robert Erskine and John of Menteith had possession of his ward (pp. 571, 574). In pursuance of the revocation of all grants of Crown lands resolved on by the Parliament of 1357, the sheriff reported that he had assumed possession of these lands on behalf of the King; but it was easier to make than to enforce laws regarding the resumption of Crown property, and a large proportion of the lands in question, Clackmannan included, were regranted by the King, "dilecto consanguineo nostro Roberto de Bruys" in 1360, and the remainder in 1364.—Reg. Mag. Sig., p. 38, No. 61, and Robertson's Index, p. 76, No. 97.

Christian, wife in succession of Gratney Earl of Mar, Sir Christopher Seton, and Sir Andrew Moray, "pannetarius Scotiæ."[1] She is said by Fordun[2] to have died at a great age in 1357, a date corroborated by the latest mention of her in the rolls. An account of the sheriff of Fife, audited 22d March 1358-9, and extending over five years, returns the rent of Pitreavie for the last three terms, but not further back, "because in the hands of lady Christian Bruce, by concession of the King."[3]

There is no foundation for the alleged second and third marriages of the King's sister Isabel—the mother of the Earl of Moray—to an unidentified Earl of Athole and an equally unidentified Alexander Bruce.[4] They must have made their way into the pedigree as a conjectural explanation of the mention in the charters above noticed of "Isabel of Athole, and Alexander Bruce, the King's nephew, her son."

VII.

For the first two years after King Robert's death Scotland hardly realised what was involved to her in his loss. Douglas had departed with the heart of his Sovereign on the mission confided to him, but the presence of the Earl of Moray at the helm of affairs operated as a check on Edward's ambition. Randolph seems to have formed one of the household of the young King and Queen, who, as well as the King's sisters, made Cardross their chief residence. That David's establishment was on a liberal scale is shown by the accounts of Henry, rector of Biggar, the Clerk of Liverance,[1] and Adam of Swynburne, Clerk of the Kitchen.[2] In 1331 new gardens were laid out, the park was surrounded with 600 roods of ditch, and repairs were made on the chambers of the King, the King's sisters, and the Regent, on the King's hall and chapel, the Queen's chapel and wardrobe, and the kitchen, larder, brewhouse, bakehouse, and wine-cellar, all which appear on the credit side of the account of the provosts of Dumbarton.[3] At Clackmannan there was a general store for marts, grain, fish, and victuals of all sorts.[4]

The Parliament which met at Perth in 1330, besides entering on the quæstio vexata of the second tithes of Aberdeen,[5] must also have imposed a duty of fourpence in the pound on goods brought by English ships to the ports of Scotland. This tax appears in the custumars' accounts at the audit of February 1330-1, and afterwards in the accounts of the provosts, and is the first instance in these records of anything that can be called an import duty paid directly to the Crown.[6] The burgh accounts of December 1331 further show that either at this Parliament, or some time before the Parliament of November 1331, a tax of one shilling in the pound had been imposed on the exportation of money out of the realm. Mention occurs for the first time in the same accounts of foreigners paying a double custom on the usual exports of wools, woolfells, and hides.[1] The existence of factories of English and Flemish merchants in some of the towns of Scotland has been already noticed; and the accounts of this period lead us to 349-365. In the account of the Chamberlain for 1330 (pp. 335, 336) the duty referred to is entered as "parva custuma," the only example in this volume, except the Perth account of 1342 already referred to, of anything bearing that name being paid immediately to the Crown.

[1] Accounts of custumars, pages 365-374. If these accounts seem rather to indicate that double custom was due by all who were not burgesses of the particular town, those of the succeeding year make it plain that the distinction was between the custom "privatorum regni" and "mercatorum extraneorum" (pp. 422-425). As has been already remarked, a minute examination of previous burgh rolls suggests that the practice of charging foreigners a higher rate may not have been then introduced for the first time. In England in 1303 Edward attempted to raise the rate of custom payable by foreign merchants, a proceeding resisted, not by the foreigners, who got some substantial concessions in return, but by the native burgesses, who considered that the money paid by the foreigners really came from them, and that the result of the new impost was to raise the price of imports and lower that of exports.—Stubbs' Constitutional History of England, vol. ii. p. 524.

The Aberdeen customs account of 1343 specifies the exact rates of custom paid both by natives and by foreigners; and while the latter paid double for wools and woolfells, that is, a mark on the sack of wool, and half a mark on the hundred woolfells, the higher rate for hides was only 20s., the lower being a mark. But the accounts of 1331 and 1332 seem to leave no doubt that literally double custom on hides also was exacted in those years.

conclude that in Aberdeen, Dundee, and Perth about a fifth of the goods chargeable with custom were exported by foreigners. In Berwick, where the foreigners were most numerous, we have not the same means of judging how large a proportion of the trade was in their hands, as there is no separation made in the accounts between goods that paid single and those that paid double duty.

David was anointed and crowned by the Bishop of St. Andrews at Scone on November 24th, 1331, and Parliament met at the same place immediately afterwards. The young King, being himself first knighted by the Regent, conferred knighthood on John Stewart, Earl of Angus, and on the Regent's eldest son and others.[1] Copyn the goldsmith was paid twenty shillings for making a small sceptre for the boy-King,[2] and the minstrels present got £20 of largess from the King, and half that sum from the Queen.[3]

That the expenses of the coronation and the Parliament succeeding it were very considerable is attested by the accounts of Roger of Irvine, Clerk of the Wardrobe to the King,[4] William of Fordoun, Clerk of the Wardrobe to the Queen,[5] and William of Buthirgask, Clerk of the Kitchen.[1] Large purchases were made of marts, swine, wild boars, cranes, wild and domestic geese, rabbits, capons, fowls, salmon, sturgeon, herrings from Crail and Dundee, hard fish and oysters.[2] The sheriffs of Forfar and Perth supplied wheat, oatmeal, malt, and barley.[3] Yellow pease, onions, and grampuses (crapoys) came from Inverkeithing.[4] Presents were sent of 6000 eels by the Bishop of St. Andrews,[5] and of swine, a boar, and five dozen lampreys by the burgesses of Perth.[6] Fifteen tuns of old wine were supplied, and nine and a half of new, five of which were consumed by the auditors of Exchequer, whose sittings immediately followed those of the Parliament.[7] Two expeditions were sent to England to buy "wardrobe articles;" the one was intrusted to Thomas of Charteris, the Clerk of Audit, and William of Fordoun, the Clerk of the Queen's Wardrobe, who were absent six weeks, and were paid for their expenses, including horses, boys, and servants, £22, 12s.[8] The other mission, confided to Malcolm More and Hugh of Upsetlington, cost 53s. 4d., besides 13s. 4d. for a horse that died by the way.[9] The wardrobe purchases include silks of Antioch and of Paris, cloth of Antioch, diaspinet (diapered silk), red and white velvet, lawn of Tripoli, cambric, cloth of "mar-

There is a miniver coverlet for a bed, a horse, and three pair of spurs for the King, girdles for the King, Queen, and King's sisters,[1] and saddles for the King and Queen's sisters.[2] A large quantity of napery is specified, with towelling for the baths of the King and Queen, as well as for the chamber (in the singular number) of the King's sisters and their aunt, Lady Christian Bruce.[3] Canvas is provided for curtains for the Queen's chamber, and for the chamber of the Regent, as well as for the "ventilagium" of the Queen's chamber.[4] We have payments to tailors, skinners, and other operatives, also alms, oblations, carriages, and other minor expenses, regarding which reference is made to the "rotulus probacionis,"[5] not now extant; and there is a payment for the writing of a roll "de officio coronacionis."[6] The "wardrobe articles" included the usual proportion of spices and confections.[7]

The only records of the coronation Parliament that have been preserved are a few judgments on appeal by private suitors,[8] but it must have sat for about a month. The absence of the King, Queen, and King's sisters, including going and returning, is counted at thirty-nine days.[9] One of the most im-

VIII.

The peace whose purchase-money had so seriously drained Scotland's resources endured but two years beyond Bruce's life. The barons whose adherence to England had cost them the loss of their Scotch possessions saw that now or never was their opportunity to regain them; and under the convenient plea of restoring to the Scots their rightful sovereign, John Balliol's son, they made preparations for invading Scotland. The English King, while he ostensibly disowned their proceedings, and had proclamation made about preserving the peace on the marches, gave them his secret support. As early as 20th July 1330 he had sent a safe-conduct to Edward Balliol, with permission to remain in his dominions as long and return as often as he pleased.[2] The Regent was not deluded by Edward's assumed attitude. Some time before March 1330-1 there occurs an entry of £40 paid to an English spy, John of Staunton, for giving warning by letter of the hostile intentions of the King of England;[3] and both Sir Robert Lauder, as sheriff of Berwick, and Sir Alexander Seton, as farmer of the town of Berwick, were authorised to expend money on defences, including the erection of military engines at Norham,[1] which place is thus shown to have been in the possession of the Scots. Edward complained that whereas it had been a condition of the treaty that restitution was to be made of the possessions of ecclesiastics of which they had been deprived during the war, the Bishop of Durham had been molested by the Earl of March in his possession of Norham and Upsetlington, and had, to the grievous prejudice both of that prelate and of the Crown of England, been summoned to the Parliament held at the coronation as a vassal of David.[2] He further remonstrated against the non-fulfilment of the obligation undertaken at the time of the treaty of Northampton, that Henry of Beaumont and Lord Wake of Liddell should be restored to their Scottish estates.

The events that followed in Scotland are best described in Mr. Burton's words as "a brief rehearsal of the wars of the Roses." In the month of July 1332 Edward Balliol and his supporters embarked from the Humber for Scotland. The Earl of Moray, whose tact and energy might have saved his country, died suddenly, and eleven days after his death the hostile fleet was in the Forth. A Parliament convened in hot haste chose Donald Earl of Mar for Regent, who had no one qualification for the office imposed on him. Balliol and his friends landed, pushed on to Strathern, and utterly defeated a large army headed by the new Regent, who was himself among the slain. They then took possession of Perth and fortified themselves there, the English fleet co-operating with them. John Crab brought ten merchant vessels from Berwick to the Tay and captured Beaumont's ship,[1] but in a general engagement his whole fleet was burned.[2] A second army attempted to blockade Perth, but dispersed without effecting anything. Scotland was now at the feet of Balliol, who was crowned at Scone on the 24th of September, and made a progress through the southern part of his dominions. But his triumph was short-lived. On the 7th of October Perth was recovered; and on the 16th of December the newly-crowned King, overmastered at Annan, and most of his army put to the sword, fled half naked across the border.

On the 20th February 1332-3, during a short breathing space before Balliol's return, we have an audit of the accounts of the burghs, or of some of them, Perth not being among the number. These contain indications that the fighting of the previous year had been less localised than is generally supposed. Berwick had been the scene of a serious

[1] This ship, known as the Beaumontscogge, came in some way into the possession of Reginald More, the Chamberlain, from whom it was purchased by the King for £200, this sum including repairs and the expenses of sailors (p. 451).

conflict, unknown to our historians, which one is disposed to connect with the circumstance that Patrick Earl of March, whose molestation of the Bishop of Durham at Norham and Upsetlington had been made matter of complaint, was governor of the castle, and that the governor of the town was Sir Alexander Seton, who had in the previous year had an allowance of £9, 9s. 7d. for military engines at Norham.[1] The sum of £150 is allowed for repairing the town walls, and £35, 17s. 7d. as compensation for injury sustained in the late war.[2] We find also that 240 boards of Baltic timber, ordered for the roof of the Minorite Church at Roxburgh, had been taken possession of by order of the late keeper of the castle, to repair damage done to the town; and 530 similar boards had been seized by the bailies by order of the present keeper to repair the castle.[3] In the Dumbarton accounts are payments for extra watchers,[4] and in those of Crail for cords supplied to Alan of Vipont for engines at Lochleven.[5] A balance of £6, 12s. 4d. is remitted to the provost of Montrose "propter vastacionem molendini,"[6] and £4 is accepted as the Martinmas rent of Forfar instead of £10, 13s. 4d. "propter destruccionem."[7] At Dundee goods which ought to have paid custom had been allowed to pass uncustomed "propter guerram;"[8] and at Kintore the rents of the hostilages and the issues of the

Chamberlain's ayres had remained uncollected "propter perturbacionem guerre."[1]

On the 9th of March 1332-3 Balliol re-entered Scotland, Edward now declaring openly for him on the plea that the Scots by their border raids had violated the conditions of peace. With a large army they together laid siege to Berwick; and on the 20th of July the Scots, hazarding a battle, sustained a crushing defeat at Halidon Hill, where the flower of the nobility perished, the list of the slain including Archibald Douglas the Regent, and the Earls of Ross, Athole (John Campbell), Lennox, Sutherland, and Strathern. The whole country submitted. Balliol held a Parliament at Edinburgh, at which he made formal surrender to England of nearly all the southern part of his dominions, and did homage to Edward for the remainder, which he had parcelled out among his adherents. The King and Queen were sent to France. All that seemed left to the national party was the possession of a few strongholds, but they held these with the tenacity of despair.[2]

Strife, however, broke out among Balliol's adherents; and Moubray, formerly one of the most prominent of them, is by and by found co-operating with Sir Andrew Moray in besieging Beaumont in Dundearg. The young Steward, who had been hiding in Bute, comes on the scene, and his countrymen begin to rally round him, Thomas Bruce, the Clackmannan ancestor, being his earliest supporter, and the Earl of Moray soon afterwards joining him. Renfrew, Kyle, and Carrick were cleared of the invaders; the Earl of Athole (David of Strathbogie), hitherto one of the most prominent of the English party, when driven to bay in his fastnesses, veered round to what for the moment was the winning side; and Balliol escaped a second time over the border.

[2] Fifty-five chalders of oats and seven stones of cheese were at this period supplied to Sir Malcolm Fleming as stores for Dumbarton, 60 chalders of oatmeal and 100 stones of cheese to John Thomson (called by Bower "valens vernaculus") and John Macsomerly for Lochdoun, while Sir Alan of Vipont got £580 for stores and expenses connected with the defence of Lochleven (p. 467).

In April 1335 a Parliament was held at Dairsie by the Steward and the Earl of Moray, now joint Regents, between whom Athole became, in some not thoroughly explained way, the means of fomenting discord.[1] Alan of Vipont's successful defence of Lochleven Castle against Sir John Stirling was one of the events of the same summer; but soon after it an invasion of Edward III. and Balliol spread havoc through Scotland. The Duke of Namur, with a [1] According to Fordun, the Earl of Athole set himself, by working on the inexperience of the Steward, to perplex the national councils: and of the proceedings of the Dairsie Parliament that historian says generally: "Nihil actum est nisi derisione dignum." It is no more than a glimpse of light that is thrown on this subject by the statement of Adam of Buthirgask, the Chamberlain's deputy, in reply to one of the accusations of his principal (p. 435), that owing to the dissensions of the Earl of Moray and the Steward he had been unable to collect the customs of any of the burghs north of the Forth, except a portion of those of Aberdeen, the rents and customs of all the rest having been collected by the two Regents.

body of foreign auxiliaries on their way to join Edward, encountered the Earls of March and Moray on the Borough Muir near Edinburgh, when, after some hard fighting, the Knight of Liddesdale appeared on the scene, and drove the foreigners through the narrow lanes of the town to the ruins of the then dismantled Castle, where they surrendered; and they were allowed to depart unmolested on engaging not to serve again in Edward's Scottish wars. The Earl of Moray escorted the strangers to the borders, but paid the penalty of his courtesy in being captured by the warden of Jedburgh Forest, and detained six years a prisoner in England.[1]

[1] An entry in the Chamberlain's account of 1342 must refer either to this conflict at Edinburgh Castle, or, more probably, to some unchronicled occurrence in the campaign of the following year, in which Edward repaired and garrisoned the Castle of Edinburgh: "Et eidem (Willelmo de Duglas), pro expensis quas fecit tempore adventus regis Anglie in Scociam, in castro de Edinburgo, ex certa convencione inter regem et ipsum, ultra summam centum marcarum quas percepit pro custodia dicti castri in certo, per literam regis, ostensam super compotum, xiij li. vj s. viij d." (p. 507).

There has been an unaccountable confusion on the part of the Scottish chroniclers between the above-mentioned Guy Duke of Namur, grandson of Guy of Dampierre, Count of Flanders, and the Count of Gueldres, who was also one of the auxiliaries of the English at this time. Fordun, Bower, Wyntoun, and the Liber Pluscardensis, all make the Count of Gueldres the commander of the body of troops who surrendered at Edinburgh Castle. The Scalacronica and the Chronicon de Lanercost, however, assert that it was the Duke of Namur; and there can be no doubt the English authorities are right. In the Fœdera (ii. 914, 917) there appear two safe-conducts from Edward to the Duke of Namur, the one dated July 12, 1335, describing him as coming with men-at-arms to the King's assistance against the Scots, the other dated Perth, August 11, 1335, ten days after the battle of the Borough Muir, describing him as on his return home.

A payment of £4 to Archibald of Craigbarry, going on the affairs

The remaining occurrences of 1335 included the re-ascendency of the friends of England, with the versatile Athole as their master spirit, the siege by Athole of Kildrummy Castle, held by King Robert's sister, the wife of the brave Sir Andrew Moray, and Athole's defeat and death at Culblene. Athole's widow, who held the island fortress of Lochindorb against the Scottish party, now implored the aid of the King of England, who in the following year marched into Scotland with a large force, raised the siege of Lochindorb, and overran and wasted the country as far north as Inverness. Sir Thomas Roscelyn, an English knight of high repute, landed at Dunnottar, and joining his forces with those of William Moubray, attacked Aberdeen. The citizens were defeated with great slaughter, but Roscelyn fell; and in retaliation, Edward, on his way south, set fire to Aberdeen.[1] Having, as he thought, of the King to the Count of Gueldres, occurs (p. 450) in the account of the Chamberlain audited January 1337-8, and including a period of three years and a half. The Count of Gueldres was husband of the only sister of David's Queen, and this mission may be supposed to have been an effort to detach him from the English alliance.

[1] Edward seems to have attached considerable importance to the possession of Dunnottar. On 23d March 1336 he issued letters in favour of Thomas of Roscelyn, empowering him to select, in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, three carpenters, three masons, and two smiths, as also one hundred archers, sufficiently provided with bows and arrows, and to proceed with them in all haste to the castle of Dunnottar. On the 7th of the following month of April fresh letters were granted by Roscelyn to select six mariners, with a barge, to proceed to Dunnottar. On the 20th of April the Admiral of the fleet in the north got orders to provide three ships for carrying his workmen and soldiers to Dunnottar; and on the following day another letter was issued, empowering Roscelyn to seize, in all harbours and places secured possession of Scotland by a chain of well-garrisoned fortresses, extending from Dunnottar to Roxburgh, the King of England returned home; but no sooner was he gone than Sir Andrew Moray and his friends were in the field. Dunnottar, Kincleven, Laurieston, St. Andrews, and Bothwell successively fell into their hands, after which followed a short lull in military operations, Edward having for the present full occupation in France.

What fragments of the Exchequer accounts of this period have been preserved afford a good deal of material for the minute history of the time. There had been an audit at Restennet in 1333,[1] of which no record remains; in 1334 the whole year's revenue had been collected by Edward Balliol.[2] Of 1337-8 we have—in a fragmentary state—accounts rendered by the sheriffs of Inverness, Forres, and Elgin,[3] and the custumars of Inverness,[4] of the regality of Moray, temporarily in the hands of the Crown during the Earl's captivity in England; also the accounts of a few burghs that were not in the enemy's hand,[5] and of Reginald More the Chamberlain.[6] These contain various noteworthy items. corded to have been in Scotland before 1339, is shown to have been present in 1335 or 1336 with a body of French auxiliaries, and to have had his services acknowledged by a payment of £120, 15s. by the Regent.[1] On passing through Aberdeen, on his way home, he accidentally set fire to the dwelling of a burgess named William Chapman, who got 20s. of compensation from the Chamberlain.[2] Sums of £164, 19s. 5½d. and £135, 0s. 6d. were expended on the defences of Berwick.[3] Compensation was made to Walter of Allyrdas for the destruction of his corn and cattle at the siege of Dunnottar,[4] and to the Chamberlain for damage done to his lands of Skeoch.[5] The injury inflicted on Aberdeen by fire and otherwise is reported to have been so serious that no rents could be levied at Martinmas 1336; no one, it is said, ventured to remain in the town except the adherents of the English.[6] Mention is made of ten ships having suddenly to depart uncustomed from Aberdeen harbour "causa inimicorum."[7] In Dundee no rents were paid for 1336, because the town was then in the enemy's possession;[8] and the fee paid to the Prior of St. Andrews is 5s. 8d., instead of 13s. 4d.[9] In Cullen, the chaplain celebrating for the soul of the late Queen is not to be longer allowed his 4s. for wine and wax, "quousque Deus dedit tempora prosperiora."[10] In

1340 the Chancellor, Sir Thomas Charteris, expresses himself content on account of the poverty of the country to abate his fee.[1]

An undated roll, probably of 1337, entitled "Responsiones Ade de Buthirgask," is so unlike anything that precedes or follows it, and so curious in its glimpses of the state of the country, as to deserve special notice.[2] Reginald More, probably a scion of the house of Rowallan,[3] was greatly in favour with Robert Bruce, as appears from gifts and charters to him during the last two years of that King's reign. He had acquired Abercorn and other estates by marriage with one of the coheiresses of the family of Graham of Eskdale, and Fermartin, Aboyne, and other Crown lands were bestowed on him by David.[4] He likewise owned Berriedale in Caithness.[5] He seems also to have had a grant of Tullibardine on the forfeiture of Andrew of Moray for his treason at Dupplin,[6] though some sort of competing right had been bestowed on Laurence of [3] There is no reason for supposing him to be (as said in the published pedigree of the Mures of Caldwell appended to the second edition of Crawford's History of Renfrewshire) son of Sir Adam More, and brother to Robert II.'s first wife. He had three sons,—William, through whose granddaughter and heiress his estates passed to the family of Lindsay of Byres; Gilchrist, ancestor of the Mures of Caldwell; and John, a churchman, rector of Kincardine, often mentioned in the rolls; besides a daughter, Alice, married first to William of Herch, and afterwards at Gaillard, to Sir John Stewart of Ralston. Preston.[1] In the last years of King Robert's reign we find him acting as deputy or clerk to the Chamberlain, and also as local Chamberlain of the shire of Stirling;[2] and on the death of Sir Robert Peebles, which occurred in November 1329, he was advanced to be Chamberlain,[3] a post which he held till his death in 1341.[4] As he accompanied David to France in 1334, he had necessarily to perform his duties connected with the revenue by deputy. Buthirgask, who was that deputy, had some years previously been Clerk of the Wardrobe,[5] and at the date of the accounts was Justiciary.[6] In these troublous times the collection of the King's revenue was no light task; but neither the way in which Buthirgask had performed this duty, nor his conduct in other matters, had satisfied his principal: and More's accusations and Buthirgask's answers, each set forth with considerable acrimony and keenness, form a curious episode in the series of Exchequer Rolls.

More's first and second complaints relate to the non-receipt by him of the customs of the burghs north of the Forth, which had been set apart for the support of the King's household, and of sums due by the Sheriffs of Aberdeen and Banff. Buthirgask in reply avers that the Steward and the Earl of Moray, in consequence of the dispute that had arisen between them, had taken it upon them to collect all the customs of the kingdom by men appointed by themselves; and that of the other sums all had been paid to More either at Dundee or at Bruges, except a portion which had been uplifted by Sir Andrew Moray at the term before the slaughter of the Earl of Athole.[1]

Buthirgask is further accused of having appropriated to himself some seventy-four fat cattle belonging to men of the Chamberlain on whom he had passed sentence as Justiciary: and his reply is that the Chamberlain's men were not convicted by him, but by a former Justiciary, William of Meldrum; that the cattle had been stolen from himself; and that the friends of one of the thieves, having found security to pay the King's fine, to make restitution, and to keep the country scaithless of the thief, had returned some of the stolen marts to him "under pledge of haymald."[2] He now claimed that the remainder should be restored to him.

The next charge is also connected with stolen cattle. John Bell having robbed some of the Chamberlain's men of cattle at Kincardine O'Neil,

[1] Probably for the necessities of the garrison at Kildrummy.

[2] "Haimhaldare, vindicare, actione reali repetere, to repeate and seeke restitution of proper guds and geare, and bring the samin hame againe, Quon. Attach. c. 4." (Skene, de Verborum Signif. sub voc.) Skene adds "and hee quha seikis the saide restitution suld sweare in this manner. Ane buike beand put within the hornes, or uppon the forehead of the beaste that is claimed, before twa lauchful witnesse that the said cattel acclaimed be him did wander awaie from him, and that the samin was nocht given, saulde or any manner of waie annalyed be him to onie kinde of person."

More's chaplain came to Buthirgask to ask his aid in recovering them, and he, having arrested the depredator, and recovered the stolen property, is accused of having kept a portion of it to himself, namely, twenty-three fat oxen and cows. The reply is that when he arrested Bell he restored all the cattle which the chaplain and the Chamberlain's men swore were their property ; but over and above these he recovered from Bell twenty-four marts, the property of the men of the Earl of Fife, then a rebel against King David, and for which he, as Justiciary, was debited in his account as escheated ;[1] and he adds, that he might have expected other reward from his master for so good a deed than to be thus maliciously calumniated.

Buthirgask, accused further of having taken a horse from one of the Chamberlain's men, claims the

[1] The words "super quibus idem Adam in compoto suo est oneratus" have, in the original roll, been substituted for something else which has been erased, the last word of the original sentence, which is still legible, being "Dunnotre." The whole paragraph has been facsimiled in the Second Part of the National Manuscripts of Scotland, no. 36 ; and in a few words of comment on it, it is inferred that Reginald More was then owner of that fortress. Such however seems not to have been the case. Dunnottar first came into possession of the Keith family in 1392 through an excambion between Sir William Lindsay of the Byres and his father-in-law, the Great Marischal of Scotland (Third Report of Historical MSS. Commission, pp. 405, 408) ; and as Lindsay's mother was granddaughter and heir of Reginald More's son, it was a natural enough conjecture that it had descended to him as heir of the Chamberlain. An entry, however, in More's account of 1337-8 of £20 received for the sale of the ward of Dunnottar, shows that the owner of that fortress, whoever he was, was in minority (p. 449).

horse as having been his own property; and as for the man from whom he took it, he says he was not aware of his being a man of the Chamberlain, but had seen him in the company of the Earl of Athole and other traitors at the siege of Kildrummy.

The remaining complaints and answers are equally characteristic; and there seems reason to believe that the auditors, viewing the dispute with their usual calmness and impartiality, had regarded the deputy as more in the right than his principal. In More's accounts there are other grievous complaints against various people, regarding which the auditors generally find the Chamberlain to have been in the wrong. Oftener than once, owing to his being unable to produce the proper vouchers, large items with which he credited himself were disallowed.[1] In his account of 1340 the ordinary charges for the expense of the Exchequer end with an item of 20s. for the clerk writing the rolls, who subjoins at the close of the audited account this significant docquet: "Et memorandum, quod dictus Reginaldus nihil soluit adhuc de feodo predicto,

[1] A charge of £640 is made by him for stores for Lochleven; and the auditors, after calling on him to produce his vouchers, find that £60 of this sum had been charged by him in a previous account (pp. 454, 467). Towards the Aberdonians, whose town the English had nearly reduced to ashes, he seems to have been unreasonably exacting. Wool had been sent to More in France by the citizens of Aberdeen to cover an old arrear of £200, and sold by him for £240. A not very intelligible claim of damage in connection with the transaction was kept up from year to year against the provosts of Aberdeen, but eventually disallowed by the auditors (pp. 465, 472, 484).

sibi allocato in compoto suo pro scriptura rotulorum; et sic in vanum laboravit clericus supradictus."[1]

In 1338 the English began again to assume the offensive, but became disheartened by their ill success in besieging the castle of Dunbar, heroically defended by Randolph's daughter, and relieved by Sir Alexander Ramsay. Under those two able soldiers, Ramsay and the Knight of Liddesdale, the Scots continued to keep possession of the open country, confining the enemy to such castles or fortified towns as they yet retained, one after another of which however soon fell into the hands of the Scots. Before long Balliol, who had never been more than a tool of Edward and the "disinherited barons," quitted Scotland. The Steward, who succeeded to the regency on the death of Sir Andrew Moray, won great éclat by his first act, the capture of Perth, which the English had for years made their headquarters, and fortified strongly. In connection with its recovery we find a payment of £53, 6s. 8d. to Sir William Douglas, who was despatched to France for succour, and brought opportunely a squadron with a strong body of men-at-arms from Calais.[2]

An equally important auxiliary with the Knight of Liddesdale was William Bullock, an ecclesiastic of obscure birth but great military talent. He had been Balliol's Chamberlain, and been greatly trusted by the English party; but for an adequate consideration he was induced to sell himself to the Scots, and deliver up the castle of Cupar, which he commanded. Bullock's zeal and efficiency raised him so high in the good graces of the Regent, that on Reginald More's death he became his successor in the Chamberlainship. But confidence in a traitor is easily shaken: suspicions arose that he had entered into a correspondence with England, and he was suddenly deposed from his office, and thrust into a squalid dungeon in Lochindorb Castle to die of cold and hunger.

The siege of Stirling followed. Its date has been matter of dispute among historians,[1] but the references to it in the accounts show that it must have occurred between June 1341 and May 1342.[2]

Edinburgh Castle was won by a clever stratagem planned by Bullock. Walter Curry, a merchant of Dundee, privately received into his ship the Knight of Liddesdale, William Fraser,[3] and a number of other bold and energetic men; and that vessel, under pretence of being an English merchantman, appeared in the Forth, and offered to supply wine and corn to the garrison. When the supposed provisions arrived at the castle, the drawbridge was lowered; the waggons and hampers were so placed that it was impossible to let down the portcullis; and, at a signal given by a horn, Douglas and his friends, who were lurking in the neighbourhood, made their appearance, and easily overpowered and expelled the strangers. One William Fairley, unmentioned by either Bower or Wyntoun, seems to have played a prominent part in this exploit, as also another burgess of Edinburgh, William Bartholomew. Fairley had been previously one of the custumars of Edinburgh,[1] a post in which Curry is afterwards found associated with him.[2] By command of the King in Parliament, Fairley and Curry got a reward of £100.[3] Bartholomew, who in 1333 was one of the provosts of Edinburgh,[4] had £40 granted to him by the King for his good services on the same occasion.[5]

[3] Page 507. Fairley's name is elsewhere mentioned; in 1329, as advancing a small sum to the King (p. 166), and in 1331 as clerk to the Chamberlain. He is probably the same William Fairley who soon after this date owned the estate of Braid, and was ancestor of the family of Fairley of Braid, whose representative in later days married a daughter of Knox the Reformer. The Fairleys of Braid have, however, claimed a pedigree irreconcileable with that here assigned them, the first of the family being alleged to have been a natural son of King Robert II. (Nisbet's Heraldry, i. 289). John Fairley, son and heir of William Fairley of Braid, married a natural daughter of Sir Henry Douglas of Lochleven (Reg. Mag. Sig., p. 156 No. 13, and p. 175 No. 32).

France. According to Froissart, whose authority Tytler follows, David was sent to France in 1332, immediately after the battle of Dupplin. Lord Hailes places his departure in 1333; but the true date is here shown to be 1334.

Among the survivors of Halidon Hill was Sir Malcolm Fleming, whose father and grandfather had been steady adherents of Robert Bruce, and who through life attached himself closely to Bruce's son, to whom, both as Earl of Carrick and as King, he had been Steward of the household. Escaping from the fatal field of Halidon to the fortress of Dumbarton, of which he was keeper, Fleming there afforded shelter to the young King and Queen till a safe opportunity should occur of sending them out of the country. In May 1334 David, accompanied by the Queen, his sisters, their ladies, and a number of attendants, embarked on board a ship which the King of France had sent for them to Dumbarton. Philip VI. had at the same time made the King of Scots a seasonable present of £1000 to buy apparel and arms, pay the sailors' wages, and provide necessaries for the voyage.[1] The royal party landed at Boulogne on the 14th of May 1334,[2] and proceeded to Paris, where they were magnificently received by the French King.[3] Château Gaillard, in Normandy, which was assigned them as a residence, was then one of the grandest feudal fortresses in France; its extensive ruin, perched on a lofty chalk cliff above the town of Andelys, is still the most conspicuous object on the banks of the Seine between Paris and Rouen. Probably few of our countrymen who now pass that way are aware that the castle which forms so picturesque a feature in the landscape was for seven years the abode of the Scottish Court. Originally a stronghold of Cœur de Lion, built by him in virtual violation of the treaty of Louviers, it had been already famed in various ways in French history. Not thirty years before David occupied it, the first Queen of Louis le Hutin, sister of the Duke of Burgundy, had been imprisoned within its walls, and strangled by order of her husband.

"The King and Queen of Scots," says Froissart, "had everything that they wanted delivered to them, for but little came from Scotland to support their state;"[1] an assertion hardly corroborated by the accounts. That the King of France was generous and hospitable is true; also that he sent material aid to Scotland in the way of ships and men-at-arms. In addition to the above-named £1000 given him before setting out, it appears that David received from Philip at various times during his stay in France sums amounting in all to £2200.[2] It is however surprising to find poor distracted Scotland managing to remit for the expenses of the kingly household between May 1334 and January 1339-40 sums amounting to £4333, 18s. 7d.,[1] in addition to which continual supplies of salted salmon from Aberdeen and elsewhere were provided for the royal table.[2]

Reginald More, the Chamberlain, formed one of the royal household during the greater part of the time of David's sojourn in France;[3] and in addition to More we find the names of the following Scotsmen as more or less resident at the Court of Gaillard during that period:—Sir Robert Keith the Marischal,[4] Sir Alexander Seton;[5] the Bishops of Moray (John Pilmore), Glasgow (John of Lindsay), and Brechin (Adam of Moray);[6] William of Dalgarnock, Abbot of Kelso,[7] who seems to have been the young King's preceptor,[8] the Abbot of Kilwinning, Master Walter of Twynham[9] the Chancellor, and Friar William of Blantyre the King's confessor.[10] Some of the persons named certify the accounts of the household at each term. Mention is also made of John of Douglas,[11] perhaps the elder brother of the first Earl of Douglas, who, according to Wyntoun, "died beyond the sea."[12]

Among minor entries connected with David's stay in France are £10, 1s. 10½d., paid for banners with his arms,[1] and 4s., Paris currency,—that is, 15d. sterling,—paid to a tailor sent from Paris to Gaillard by the Company of the Bardi.[2]

We have it on Froissart's authority that David of Scotland was one of three kings, the other two being the Kings of Bohemia and Navarre, who fought in the army of the French King in his English wars.[3]

In the spring of 1341, encouraged by the favourable accounts sent by the Regent of the condition of the country, which was reported to be almost clear of the enemy, the King and Queen with the suite embarked for Scotland, and landed at Inverbervie on the 2d of June of that year.[4] £67, 17s. were paid to Lambert Spaldfis and Copin called Godard for their passage-money and expenses by the way.[5] From Inverbervie they proceeded to Aberdeen, where the provosts are found crediting themselves with large supplies of furnishings for them, including victuals, wine, clothing, spices,[6] a saddle and bridle for Sir Andrew of Meldrum,[7] and gifts by the King to the Clerk Register and others.[8] The custumars of Aberdeen at the same time take credit for payments to the tailors of the Queen and the King's sisters "circa consuecionem pannorum

earundem,"[1] also for the expenses at Aberdeen and passage to France of Ingeram de Seinte Bove,[2] to whose valet the Chamberlain makes, on the King's behalf, a payment of £6, 13s. 4d.[3]

After a short stay at Aberdeen, the royal party proceeded to Kildrummy to visit the venerable sister of Robert Bruce and widow of Sir Andrew Moray. The King grants a charter at Kildrummy, of date 10th June 1341, and we soon afterwards find lady Christian getting four chalders of wheat and a cargo of wine sent her for the Queen's expenses.[4]

The King was again at Aberdeen at a parliament or council held there in February 1341-2,[5] and at Kildrummy on 14th April following,[6] and in the course of 1342 we trace the King and Queen at Dunbar,[7] and on an expedition to the Marches,[8] probably on the occasion when, after liberally distributing the honours of knighthood, David made a raid into Northumberland, and had to beat an inglorious retreat.[9] A sojourn of the King at Ayr is mentioned in the accounts of that burgh,[10] and the provosts of Dumbarton render account of various carriages to Ayr, Kilwinning, Haddington, Stirling, Linlithgow, Kirkintilloch, and elsewhere, with the King's harness.[1] We read of the King being at Scone, Lindores, Inverkeithing, and at the justice-ayre at Cupar, at all which places he received large supplies of fish from Crail.[2] The King, Queen, and King's sisters spent a night at Banff;[3] on the 27th August and 28th November the King was again at Kildrummy,[4] and he seems, in company with his sisters, to have made some stay at Aberdeen. On that occasion £234 were disbursed on account of the royal party by the custumars of Aberdeen, that sum including not only furnishings for the King's household and suitable apparel for Christmas, but the expenses of ambassadors sent to the Roman Court (£66, 13s. 4d.), and of entertaining the ambassadors of the French King.[5]

Mention is made of the King purchasing several horses, each at £10, from Sir John Stewart of Derneley and others,[6] and of the expenses of his charger and his groom at Lindores;[7] and two grooms of the King passing into France by the King's command get 26s. 8d.[8] A falconer of John of the Isles bringing falcons to the King gets 13s. 4d.,[9] an indication that that chieftain, who had been in alliance with Edward Balliol, and is known to have been pardoned in 1344, was already making his peace with David.

Jousts were a prevailing fashion of the day. In the accounts of 1329 there occurs a payment by the Chamberlain to the Sheriff of Edinburgh for the making of a park near Edinburgh "ubi milites pugnabant, et in quo miles Angliæ fuit devictus."[1] That David took part in the popular pastime is shown by entries in the accounts of the custumars of Aberdeen and provosts of Dumbarton "pro apparatu regis ad hastiludia," and "pro armaturis hastiludiorum domini regis;"[2] but it is not likely that the combats in which he engaged were of the same serious character as the jousts between Scottish and English knights described by Bower and Wyntoun,[3] which often ended fatally.

Though David was but a youth of seventeen when he returned from France, the Steward at once gave up the government into his hands; but it soon became manifest that, unless it were personal intrepidity, he had none of the great qualities of his father, but was deficient alike in wisdom, energy, and firmness. It was not indeed in the brilliant and luxurious Court of Philip of Valois that he could have been expected to learn how to rule a country harassed at once with war, famine, pestilence, and internal feuds.

[1] Page 238. By a charter dated 13th August 1456, James II. conveyed to the burgh of Edinburgh the hollow and low ground near the rock called Craigingalt on the road towards Leith, afterwards known as Greenside, "pro tournamentis, jocis, et justis actibus bellicis ibidem, ad nostri et nostrorum successorum complacentiam, faciendis et peragendis" (Charters of Edinburgh, Burgh Rec. Soc. p. 82). We learn however from Dr. Wilson that the favourite scene of royal tournaments was a spot of ground near the King's Stables, just below the Castle wall (Memorials of Edinburgh, vol. i. p. 23). On 4th April 1618 Robert Scott was served heir to his brother in the King's Stables beneath the Castle wall "cum officio observationis hastaludii, et pecia terræ viridis ad occidentem dicti hastaludii apud portam occidentalem de Edinburgh" (Index of Retours, Edinburgh, No. 398).

Some notion of what the wars of the last ten years had done to exhaust Scotland's resources may be had by an examination of Bullock's account as Chamberlain rendered in July 1342—immediately before his fall.[1] Comparing it with More's account of 1331,[2] which, like it, embraced the period of a year, we find that in 1331 the balance received by the Chamberlain from the sheriffs was £1474, 18s. 0¼d., from the provosts, £499, 16s. 2½d., and from the custumars, £1799, 9s. 6¾d., in all £3774, 3s. 9½d. In 1342 the receipts from the Sheriffs were £500, 17s. 9d., from the provosts £318, 3s. 4d., and from the custumars £379, 8s. 3¾d., making a total of £1198, 9s. 4¾d. From Bullock's account we also learn that contributions had been imposed by two successive Parliaments, held respectively at Scone and at Dundee. The former Parliament must have met some time before the King's return, probably in 1340,[3] the latter in 1341. The clergy bore their share in the national burden, and the receipts from

[2] Page 393.

[3] In Bullock's account, audited 11th June 1342, the first contribution is said to have been due "de termino Pasche ultimo preterito," which must mean Easter 1341, as mention immediately follows of no payment having been received from the see of Ross for the second term (p. 501).

clergy, burghs, and sheriffdoms together amounted to £1205, 12s. 3d.[1] and 306 marts.[2]

Out of his diminished revenue we find the King mindful of those who earned his gratitude or that of the nation, including such as yet survived of those friends and relatives whom his father had been wont to remember; but from the emptiness of the exchequer he had often to satisfy Crown pensioners with partial payments, sometimes substituting an assignment to Crown lands for money. Among others who had donations and pensions paid them were lady Ellen of Mar, and her husband Sir John Menteith;[3] John of Moray, eldest son of Sir Andrew and lady Christian Bruce;[4] lady Margaret of Moray,[5] perhaps sister of John; Gilbert of Carrick,[6] and Sir William Saint Clair. The name of John Saint Clair also occurs—probably of Herdmanston—who, in place of a pension of £20, has assigned him, at the King's pleasure, the thanage of Cowie.[7] Thomas, son of Ysaak, has an annual fee of £6, 13s. 4d.; but he is apparently not yet husband of the King's sister, as the two sisters are mentioned together as if unmarried in the same account;[8] and soon after the date of this account there occurs, as already noticed, a payment by the provosts of Banff for the King, Queen, and King's sisters spending a night at

Banff.[1] Sir Maurice Moray, a very valued adherent, besides £29, 17s. for munitions for the castle of Stirling, of which he had been appointed keeper,[2] and sixty marts paid him directly by the Chamberlain,[3] received out of the sheriffdom of Lanark and burghs of Aberdeen and Perth £124, 4s.,[4] obtaining at the same time extensive grants of land in the shires of Lanark and Roxburgh, and the earldom of Strathern.[5]

Of Sir Malcolm Fleming's salary of 100 marks, as Governor of Dumbarton, he receives directly but £24, obtaining in lieu of the remainder an assignment to the rents of Cadyow, and the proceeds of the contribution from the sheriffdom of Lanark down to Whitsunday.[6] The King had however, but a few months before, bestowed on him a large grant of Crown lands, in which was included the burgh of Wigtown, erected into an earldom, with full rights of regality. There are presents to Fleming's two daughters. Lady Marjory, besides £19, 6s. 8d. said to be in payment of a debt due to her by the King,[7] gets a piece of cloth of gold worth £4, 13s. 4d.[8] Lady Evota, on occasion of her retirement from the Court ("in recessu de curia"), perhaps her marriage, gets 20s.[1]

Fairley and Curry, as already mentioned, and also William Fraser, were rewarded for their share in the capture of Edinburgh Castle.[2] The Knight of Liddesdale was made keeper, with 100 merks yearly, until the re-establishment of peace.[3] He was allowed £33, 1s. 3d. for military engines and other works at the Castle, and £18, 11s. 8d. for other expenses, and he obtained an exemption from the 'contribution' in respect of his lands in the shire of Forfar and those of his brother.[4] But the post of governor of a fortress offered too little scope and, if the younger lady be meant, one suggestive of relations of a very intimate description having subsisted between her and the King. If the title in Robertson's Index (p. 50 No. 2) is to be relied on, of a charter of David II. "to Malcolm Wallayis, of the lands within the sheriffdome of Dumfries resigned by Marjorie Fleming, foster-sister to the King, Countess of Wigtoun," it would follow that the wife of Sir Malcolm Fleming had been foster-sister of Robert Bruce. But as there are many verbal slips in the titles in this Index, it is possible that we should read, "daughter of the Earl of Wigtoun," instead of "Countess of Wigtoun." The relationship of fosterage still constituted a powerful tie in Scotland, and may perhaps explain the footing on which David stood with Marjory Fleming; yet it would be difficult to point out an instance in which even a King's mistress granted under her seal a writ for the payment of a Crown debt. Fleming's daughter Marjory afterwards married William of Fawsyde, and they had, in 1365, a charter for her life, of the mill of Tollygart, called Lyndmill, part of the Crown lands of Clackmannan. —Reg. Mag. Sig., p. 38 No. 47.

[1] Lady Evota married John of Ramsay, and the King bestowed on them the thanage of Tannadyce (p. 589). William Ramsay of Colluthie, Earl of Fife by marriage with the Countess, had a son—either by her or by a former wife—unknown to Peerage writers, who in 1359 got a present from the King (p. 609). It seems not improbable that he was Evota Fleming's husband.

for adventure to so restless a spirit as Douglas's, and he shortly afterwards got the natural brother alluded to, known as Sir William Douglas the elder, substituted in his place.[1] Sir Alexander Ramsay got £26, 13s. 4d. to put the castle of Roxburgh in order.[2]

The Dominican Friars, who were that year holding their general chapter at Edinburgh, got a donation of 40s.; and Friar John the carpenter, a Minorite, was paid £13, 6s. 8d., "pro artificio suo et labore, ad mandatum regis ubique faciendis."[3]

About this time envoys were in the way of passing between Scotland and Norway. There is a payment of £13, 6s. 8d. to Sir Patrick of Graham going to Norway on the King's affairs,[4] and 26s. 8d. are paid by the King's command to a messenger of the Queen of Norway.[5] The custumars' accounts of Aberdeen contain, some time between May 1341 and May 1342, a remission of the contribution in favour of a Norwegian merchant, granted in compliance with a request made by the Queen of Norway to Lady Christian of Moray.[6] The pur-

[1] Bullock's account shows distinctly that it was the same Sir William Douglas who brought the French armament to Perth, and aided in the recovery of Edinburgh Castle, that was made keeper of that fortress. Though none of our historians say that this post was first bestowed on the Knight of Liddesdale, the fact serves to explain the way in which Wyntoun (l. 5742), Bower (Scotichronicon, xiii. 47), and the Liber Pluscardensis (ix. 38)—all doubtless borrowing, as they often do, from a common source—speak of him as conferring that office on his brother.

port of the intercourse between the countries does not further appear; the King of Norway was then almost as little in a position to aid David as David was to aid him.[1]

The burgh accounts abound with claims for abatement of rent, founded on stories of devastation and burning, some of which have been left unchronicled by our historians, as in the case of Crail—where the destruction is laid to the door, not of the enemy only, but of the Steward as "custos regni"[2]—and Haddington.[3] The fermes of Perth for the term of Martinmas 1342 were immediately in the hands of the King, any rents that were obtained being accounted for, not by the provosts, but by a receiver of fermes, who succeeded in getting 36s. 5d. from the burgh tenants, 40s. from the mill, and 482 salmon from the fishings.[4] The rent paid before the war had been £160 yearly.

More serious as results of the troubles of David's minority than even the impoverishment of the country, were the weakening of the royal authority and the deterioration of the character of the nobles.

[1] In 1319, on failure of the direct male line of the Norwegian kings, the Diet called to the throne Magnus II. of Sweden, grandson through his mother of the late King. But the choice was not a happy one. His queen, Blanche, a sister of the Duke of Namur, whose generous treatment by the Scots has been above alluded to, was fired with a foolish ambition that her consort should also be King of Denmark; and by making war at her instigation against that country, he, instead of gaining a third crown, lost those that he already possessed—being compelled, in 1343, to resign Sweden to his elder, and Norway to his younger, son.

The Steward, the Knight of Liddesdale, Ramsay of Dalwolsey, and the other heroes of the war, had for years been wielding almost irresponsible power; and they could hardly be expected to be very submissive to a pleasure-loving King, whose character commanded little respect, and who, in bestowing his rewards on one commander, had not the tact to avoid interfering with the claims of another. Feuds were daily springing up that bequeathed legacies of vengeance to succeeding generations. At the time of the King's return, Sir Alexander Ramsay had newly added fresh distinction to what he had previously won by his capture of Roxburgh Castle. David injudiciously made him not only keeper of that castle, but sheriff of Teviotdale, superseding in this post another commander who had borne an equally prominent part in the war, the Knight of Liddesdale. The sequel is well known: leading a band of soldiers to Hawick, where the sheriff was transacting the business of his office, Douglas seized him, carried him wounded and bleeding to his castle of Hermitage, and thrust him into a dungeon to die of starvation. As the culprit was too great for the law, the deed remained unpunished; and not only so, but the murdered man's offices were, at the Steward's request, conferred on the murderer. Some years later Douglas is said, in pursuance of another feud, to have hired assassins to murder David of Barclay; and his treasonable correspondence with England does not admit of doubt: he can therefore hardly be said to have met with an undeserved fate when waylaid and murdered in Ettrick Forest by his kinsman and godson the first Earl of Douglas. In another age or country a knight who had thus tarnished his spurs could only ironically have been designated "The Flower of Chivalry."

The fortresses having been recovered from the English, and Edward having found in France a more tempting field for his ambition, it would have been the wisdom of the Scots to use the cessation of hostilities in healing the wounds and recruiting the exhausted strength of their country. But a renewal of the border raids was more to their mind; and ere long David, at the instigation of his French allies, assembled an army at Perth, and marched southwards to invade England. His expedition had an inauspicious beginning in the murder of Ranald MacRuari by the Earl of Ross in the monastery of Elcho, and the return of the assassin and all his men to the mountains. Edward III. was then engaged with the siege of Calais; but the whole array of England was called out under the Archbishop of York; and at Neville's Cross near Durham the Scots encountered, on the 17th October 1346, the most crushing defeat that had befallen them since the days of Edward I.: their loss was estimated at 15,000; nearly all their leaders were either slain or captured, and the King himself was conducted at the head of a train of captives to the Tower of London. Among the many evidences of the deep hold that this calamity took of the national mind is the way in which it is for many years afterwards made a punctum temporis in the accounts: the expressions "a tempore belli de Durham," "ante conflictum de Durham," "post conflictum de Durham," being of continual occurrence.[1]

A glimpse of the state of the revenue of the Crown in one of the parts of Scotland that had suffered least from the war is presented by an account of the sheriff of Aberdeen[2] for the terms of Martinmas 1347 and Whitsunday 1348, the only sheriff's account of the period which is extant. The Crown lands are gone over, and also the lands from which casualties should be due to the Crown, with the following unsatisfactory result. Nothing from Obeyn (Aboyne) or the thanages of Fermartine, Kintore, and Aberdeen, because in the hands of the Queen or the King's sisters; nothing from Logyerdach or Craggy, because in the hands of Mary of Meldrum, "quo titulo ignoratur;" or from Straloch, because in the hands of Henry le Chene, "super quo consulatur rex." The wards, reliefs, and marriages are equally unproductive, being in each case reported to be in the hands of some one to whom they had been conceded by the Steward; and the same hopeless reference always follows to the captive King. The issues of three circuits of the Justiciary are likewise returned at nothing, inasmuch as their collection has not been permitted by the Earl of Ross: the Justiciary was the same Earl of Ross who had murdered Ranald MacRuari and led his followers away from the King's host. Nothing from the fines of the Sheriff-courts, because the sheriff alleges there have been none, into the truth of which assertion the Chamberlain is directed to make inquiry. The whole receipts amount to £19, 7s. 8d., which sum the sheriff is allowed to retain in lieu of his fee.

Exhausted and impoverished Scotland was about to have her remaining resources yet further drained for the ransom-money of David. From the last two rolls printed in this volume a good deal of information may be gathered about the way in which the nation attempted to meet this new demand; but it is thought better to reserve the subject for the Preface to the next volume, whose accounts throw a fuller light on it.

It remains for the writer of this Preface to acknowledge valuable assistance received from Mr. Marwick, Town-Clerk of Glasgow, who has made the subject of burghal history and antiquities a life-long study, from Mr. William Forbes Skene, and from the ever ready counsel of Mr. Dickson, Curator of the Historical Department of the General Register House.

GEORGE BURNETT.

APPENDIX TO PREFACE.

No. I.

SECOND TITHES OF ABERDEEN.

THE subject of the second tithes payable to the Bishop of Aberdeen, under the early endowments of the see, came to be much discussed and disputed in the first half of the fourteenth century; and in consequence of official excerpts from the Exchequer rolls, which have since been lost, having been made in the course of the discussion, and engrossed in the Chartulary of Aberdeen, we are able to supplement the rolls still in the Register House.

In the early records of the see of Aberdeen, the second tithes are described as the tenth of the royal revenues, as well from thanages as burghs, and of all demesne lands between the rivers Dee and Spey, and the tenths of all escheats and fines and issues of the Courts of the Justiciary, Chamberlain, and Sheriffs within that district.

These tithes were repeatedly confirmed to the see by the Crown, as by charters of King William the Lion, Alexander II., and David II. They were the subject of an inquest held by the Great Chamberlain at Aberdeen in the year 1333, when the right of the see was affirmed.[1]

Another inquest, held at Aberdeen by the Marischal

[1] Chartulary of Aberdeen, vol. i. page 54.

in 1341,[1] resulted in a similar verdict, and was followed by a charter of David II., dated at Kildrummy, 14th April 1342.[2]

Towards the end of the year the King, who was again at Kildrummy, granted a precept to the Chancellor for issuing letters under the Great Seal in favour of the Bishop touching the second tithes. It is dated Kildrummy, 8th November 1342.[3]

On the morrow of the Feast of St. Leo, Pope, 1342, an inquest was held at Banff by order of the King, who returned a verdict that the Bishop's right to the second tithes was well established, and had been in use from time immemorial.[4]

The question did not, however, rest here; for in a Parliament held at Scone in June 1344 it was submitted to the judgment of the prelates there, who, after an inspection of documents, declared that the Bishops of Aberdeen were entitled to enjoy the second tithes without molestation.[5]

Five years later, the Bull of Pope Adrian IV., dated in 1157, being the earliest authentic record of the see, and in which the right to the second tithes was confirmed, was submitted to a Council of the Scottish clergy held at Aberdeen in November 1359, and an inspeximus of it, certified by their seals, was engrossed in the Chartulary of the Bishopric.[6]

Next, the King, in a full Council held at Perth on the 12th April 1360, granted letters in favour of the Bishop, which, after reciting the early Bulls and charters by which the right of second tithes had been constituted and confirmed, the inquests which had been held recently and in earlier times, and the frequent discussions with his Council which had taken place as well in Parliament as elsewhere, commands the Justiciary north of the Forth, the Sheriffs of Aberdeen and Banff, the provosts of burghs and their bailies, and all others concerned, to make payment to the Bishop of Aberdeen and his successors in all time coming of the second tithes.[1]

But all the repeated inquests, confirmations, and warrants seem to have been insufficient for the purpose; for in August 1382, King Robert III., while at his hunting seat of Glenfinlas, issued a precept under the Privy Seal to the Chancellor, commanding him to issue a charter under the Great Seal to Adam, Bishop of Aberdeen, granting authority to his own mairs and officers to distrain for the second tithes due to him in place of the Sheriffs and King's officers, who were often remiss in the recovery of these tithes.[2] Of the same date, a writ under the Great Seal was issued, commanding the barons and tenants of lands from whom the second tithes were exigible to make payment to the Bishop's officers.[3]

On the following day, the 27th August, and while still at Glenfinlas, the King granted a precept under the Privy Seal to the Clerk Register, directing a search to be made of the royal registers, and also the rolls of the Sheriffs of Aberdeen and Banff, for any documentary evidence making for the right or freedom of the Bishop and Church of Aberdeen, on the ground that during a recent vacancy of the see many muniments of the Church had been abstracted, and several of those remaining had been maliciously deprived of their seals.[4]

The result of these inquiries is contained in letters under the Great Seal, dated at Leith, 29th November 1382, where sundry extracts are certified from the rolls of the Sheriffs of Aberdeen and Banff, ranging in date from 1264 to 1381.[1] These extracts are subjoined; and on examining them it will be seen that that of earliest date, from the account of Andrew of Garuyach, Sheriff of Aberdeen, in 1264, corresponds with that given in the present volume.[2] The second extract, from the account of R. of Strathechyn, Sheriff of Banff, is given more fully than by Lord Haddington,[3] and the same is the case with the accounts of G. of Malavilla, Sheriff of Aberdeen,[4] and Reginald le Chene, farmer of Fermartin.[5] The entries on the dorse of the account of Andrew of Garviach for 1266, which occur in the royal extract, are not given at all by Lord Haddington. The remaining extracts are from accounts now lost.[6]

The references to the second tithes throughout this volume harmonise with and illustrate the narrative now given. In 1328 they are entered as paid to the Bishop, "ad terminum vite sue tantum."[7] In 1329 the payment is made on the footing that the right ceased with the life of Henry Cheyne, the Bishop who had just died.[8] In 1330 the payment was made on the statement that the Bishop had established his right at the last Parliament.[9]

[6] These letters have been the means of preserving to us another record of at least equal value—the portion of the Crown rental of Alexander III. relating to lands within the see of Aberdeen—a document important both from the information that it conveys regarding the early condition of the district to which it refers, and from the light which it throws on the general subject of the ancient valuation of land in Scotland.

In 1341 the Bishop got payment of the second tithes only "de gracia ad presens,"[1] and the settlement in 1342 was with the same proviso.[2]

In 1340 the second tithes were paid for the first term, but as to the next term nothing was paid, "quousque dominus rex cum consilio suo suam dixerit voluntatem."[3] In 1358 payments to account of second tithes were made, but still only "de gracia regis;"[4] and with regard to the second tithes of Balhelvy, which were admitted "de gracia regis ad presens;" and an order was issued to the Sheriff that henceforth he should not pay the Bishop any certain sum as second tithes, but only the tenth penny of the money drawn by the King, according to the rent of the land.[5]

The right of the Bishop of Aberdeen to the second tithes of "all wardis relefis and mariagis, vscheis of courtis, eschetis and utheris profitis falland to the King" in the shires of Aberdeen and Banff, was again recognised and fortified by a writ under the Privy Seal of Robert Duke of Albany, dated at Perth, 21st June 1417.[6]

[RESPONSIONES ADE DE BUTHIRGASK AD QUERELAS CAMERARII.]

[A.D. 1337—ut videtur.]

AD hoc, quod Reginaldus More, camerarius, opponit contra Adam de Bothirgask, quod tota custuma ex parte boreali aque de Forth fuit assignata ad sustentacionem domini nostri regis, et quod illa assignacio in defectu suo non fuerat perimpleta, ad hoc Adam respondit, dicens, quod nunquam in defectu suo, sed propter discordiam inter dominum Senescallum et comitem Morauie, qui omnes firmas et custumas domini nostri regis, per totum regnum Scocie per homines suos proprios fecerunt colligere, preter iiij^{xx}xviij ℔. xij ß. vij ₫., receptos per dictum Adam, de custuma de Aberdene, super quibus in rotulis compoti sui, redditi apud Restynot, est oneratus, et inde racionem ibidem reddidit. Et residuum tocius custume de Aberdene dominus Senescallus personaliter recepit, preter xl ℔., liberatas Reginaldo More de custuma de Aberden, per Dauidem de Foty, et xl ℔., per Simonem Gelsyauch, et xvij ℔. vj ß. v ₫., liberatas seruientibus Petri machiner et Paulini Mitney, nomine dicti Reginaldi.

Item, quod Reginaldus More dicit, quod de vicecomitibus de Kyncardyn et Aberden, vnacum exitibus burgi de Aberden, et de iiij^{xx} marcis, sibi assignatis de vicecomitatu de Banf, nunquam percepit denarium de tribus terminis; dictus Adam respondit, dicens, quod omnes denarios de predictis locis de dictis tribus terminis prouenientes totaliter persoluit eidem Reginaldo, preter pecuniam receptam per dominum Andream de More, custodem, de vltimo termino, videlicet, de termino Sancti Martini proximo ante interfectionem comitis Atholie; et ad istud clarifiendum, hec est summa recepta per dictum Reginaldum de tribus terminis, videlicet, primo, apud Dunde, eidem Reginaldo, per literam suam de recepto, ostensam super compotum, cvij ℔. xvij ß. iij ₫. ob., et eidem Reginaldo apud Bruge, per literas suas, et Archibaldi de Cragbarry, nomine ipsius, ostensas super compotum, vj^{xx} ℔.

Item, Archebaldo de Cragbarry, antedicta vice, nomine dicti Reginaldi, per Dauidem de Foty soluentem, xx ℔. Et eidem Reginaldo, per Johannem de Fyfe soluentem, xlvj ℔. xiij ß. iiij ₫. Et eidem, per magistrum Thomam de Fyngask soluentem, liij ℔. vj ß. viij ₫.

Summa recepte per dictum Reginaldum de dictis tribus terminis, iij^{c}xlvij ℔. xvij ß. iij ₫. ob., de dictis vicecomitibus.

Ad hoc, quod Reginaldus More dicit, quod de hominibus suis, pro septem ouibus coram dicto Ada dampnatis, idem Adam iij^{xx}xiiij animalia grossa iniuste cepit, Adam respondet pro se, dicens, quod coram ipso homines dicti Reginaldi non fuerunt dampnati, sed coram Willelmo de Melgdrum, tunc justiciario, quia idem Adam ad tunc non habuit commissionem justiciarie, prout patet per datum sue commissionis, quam inde habet. Tamen verum est quod duo homines dicti Reginaldi fuerunt indictati et per assisam actiuati de xviij^{x} sanis ouibus et de lv grossis animalibus, et de tribus equis, furatis de dicto Ada et hominibus suis iuxta Kyncardyn de Nelee, in vigilia beati Laurencii, anno, etc., xxxv^{to}, quorum vnus per amicos suos fuit redemptus, qui inuenerunt justiciario securitatem sub certis plegiis, ad soluendum domino regi, pro vita sua, iiij marcas, et ad satisfaciendum eidem Ade de bonis predictis, et ad seruandum patriam ab ipso illesam; cuius plegii eidem Ade quamdam summam animalium liberauerunt, sub plegio de Haymald, in partem solucionis bonorum suorum predictorum. Vnde idem Adam petit integram restitucionem de predictis xviij^{xx} ouibus, lv grossis animalibus, et de tribus equis, vnacum restitucione emolumentorum de totis catallis prouenientibus per trihennium.

Item, ad hoc, quod Reginaldus More dicit, quod vbi Johannes Bell depredauit homines ipsius Reginaldi apud Kyncardyn O Nelee, vbi capellanus dicti Reginaldi venit ad dictum Adam, tanquam locum tenentem dicti Reginaldi, subcursum eiusdem Reginaldi impetraturus, et prefatus Adam predictum Johannem, cum bonis et aliis antedictorum depredatorum, arrestauit, et de bonis eorundem hominum penes se recepit et adhuc detinet xxiij grossos boues et vaccas, de quibus petit restitucionem sibi fieri, vnacum dampnis contingentibus infra bihennium elapsum, videlicet, pro stipendio cuiuslibet bouis, iiij bollas farine auene per annum, et de qualibet vacca, v petras casei et vnum stirk, per annum; Adam respondit pro se, dicens, quod verum est quod capellanus dicti Reginaldi venit ad eum, quum predictus Johannes homines dicti Reginaldi depredauerat, ab ipso succursum petendo, et idem Adam, cum comitiua sua, dictum Johannem, cum catallis per ipsum depredatis, arrestauit, et hominibus dicti Reginaldi omnia animalia sua et catalla integraliter restituit, pro quibus dictus capellanus et homines dicti Reginaldi iurare voluerint fore catalla sua propria. Tamen de dicta preda remanserunt xxiiij marthi, qui fuerunt catalla hominum comitis de Fyfe, qui tunc erat contra fidem domini regis Dauidis, qui venerunt in succursum in terris eiusdem Reginaldi, super quibus idem Adam in compoto suo est oneratus, tanquam de eschaeta . . . . . Vnde idem Adam dicit, quod ipse credebat aliam remuneracionem de magistro suo pro tali beneficio reportasse, quam inde maliciose calumniasse.

Item, ad hoc, quod Reginaldus conqueritur quod dictus Adam cepit Johannem filium Laurencii, hominem suum, et ab ipso iniuste cepit vnum equum, Adam respondit, quod se wlt expurgari secundum ordinacionem domini nostri custodis, vel aliorum de consilio suo, quod nesciuit ipsum fuisse hominem Reginaldi More, nec in cuius terra mansit, sed bene nouit ipsum de comitiua comitis Adtholie ad obsessionem castri de Kyndromy, inter alios proditores, et quod dictus equus quem dictus Adam ab ipso cepit fuit proprius equus eiusdem Ade. Beneplacet sibi quod sit declaratum per assisam ad proximum iter justiciarie.

Item, ad hoc, quod Reginaldus conqueritur, quod dominus noster custos sibi assignauit terciam partem firmarum vicecomitatuum de Aberden et del Miernys, Adam dicit, quod de illa assignacione nunquam sciuit. Tamen dicit, quod de istis duobus annis vltimo preteritis, liberauit eidem Reginaldo maiorem summam pecunie quam ad manus suas prouenit de omnibus exitibus dictorum vicecomitatuum, quia liberauit sibi, vna vice, per literam, ij^{c}iiij^{xx}x li., et alia vice, per literam, vij^{xx}xiij li. vj s. viij d. et iam de nouo, vij^{xx} li., nomine domini custodis, per credenciam dicti Ade de d factam inter diuersos mercatores, de quibus hucusque non est satisfactum de vno denario.

Item, quoad firmas de Obyn, eidem Reginaldo, per dominum nostrum custodem assignatas, Adam dicit, quod nunquam in defectu suo remanent insolute, sed per assignacionem domini nostri custodis, factam dominis Roberto de Meyners et Johanni Cabro, militibus, per literas domini nostri custodis patentes. Et quod non in defectu eiusdem Ade bene apparet, quia dictus Reginaldus non potuit plus querere firmas de Obyn de termino Sancti Martini, ipso presente, quam dictus Adam potuit querere dictas firmas de termino Pentecostes, dicto Reginaldo absente.

Item, ad hoc, quod Reginaldus More dicit, quod dictus Adam habuit vnam literam ad custodiendum, sub sigillis custodum, continentem vj^{c}xl li., Adam dicit, quod nunquam vidit illam literam, sed verum est, quod ipse habuit vnam literam dictorum vicecomitatuum sub sigillis custodum, quam liberauit domino Thome de Lychtona, cum omnibus aliis euidenciis compoti sui, apud Restynot, in vno amperio de spechynis, quequidem litera est super scaccarium.

Item, ad hoc, quod Reginaldus dicit, quod dictus Adam et Willelmus de Melgdrum ceperunt hominem dicti Reginaldi infra vicecomitatum de Miernys indictum, et abduxerunt eum, contra virtutem statutorum domini nostri regis, vsque in vicecomitatum de Aberden, et ille homo allegans rem pro qua indictatus fuit esse de guerra adquisitam in comitiua domini custodis, per homines illius patrie in qua dicta res fuerat capta, et ad hoc ostendit plegium, et Adam respondit, quod de capcione dicti hominis nunquam sciuit, nec per cuius preceptum fuit deductus ad curiam justiciarie vicecomitatus de Aberdene, nec qua de causa, antequam vidit ipsum ibidem personaliter comparere. Et quia calumpnia dicti Reginaldi tangit dictum Willelmum et Adam coniunctim, Adam dicit quod sine presencia dicti socii sui, decenter non poterit respondere. Tamen videtur sibi, et firmiter credit, quod secundum responsum suum in primo introitu super querela ipsum tangente iuste et secundum assisam terre sine malicia fuit pertractatus.

VISUS COMPOTI REGINALDI MORE, CAMERARII SCOCIE, REDDITI APUD ABERDEN SEPTIMO DIE JANUARII, ANNO GRACIE, ETC. XXX. SEPTIMO.

Reginaldus More.

Visus compoti Reginaldi More, camerarii Scocie, redditi apud Abirden, septimo die Januarii, anno gracie M°CCC^mo^XXX^mo^ septimo, de receptis suis et expensis, a festo Sancti Martini, anno gracie, etc. XXX^mo^ quarto, vsque in diem presentis compoti, et sic computat hic de septem terminis. Et nihil hic de vno anno tempore regis Anglie, quia ministri sui ad opus suum, et ad opus Edwardi de Balliolo, se totaliter de eodem anno intromiserunt. Et nihil hic de termino Pentecostes, anno gracie, etc. XXX^mo^ secundo, post bellum Berwyci, quia compotum suum de eodem termino fuit redditum apud Restinoth, coram auditoribus compotorum regiorum, per dominum Johannem de Roxburgo, clericum suum in hac parte, vt patet in rotulo de compoto eiusdem, ibidem reddito, licet idem Reginaldus impugnet aliquas summas, de quibus oneratus est, per compotum suum redditum apud Restinoth, videlicet, viginti libras receptas de domino Symone Fraser, tunc vicecomite de Kyncardyn, et domino comite de Fyf, ac triginta tres libras tres solidos et quatuor denarios, receptas de Willelmo Boner, constabulario de Kyngorne, de anno gracie, etc. XXX^mo^ secundo.

Idem onerat se de xxj ß. ij d., receptis de custumariis burgi de Inuernesse, per compotum suum redditum apud Abirden. Et de xl li., receptis de vicecomite de Abirden, de firmis de Munimusk, per compotum suum ibidem redditum. Et de iiij li., receptis de vicecomite de Kyncardyn, per compotum suum redditum apud Abirden. Et de vij^{c}iiij^{xx}xiij ℔. iij ß. xj đ. ob., receptis de Ada de Buthirgask de denariis domini nostri regis, receptis per dictum Adam, a diuersis ministris regiis in Scocia, vt patet in compotis eiusdem Ade, redditis apud Rostinoth, de anno gracie, etc. xxx^{mo} sexto, et apud Abirden, de anno gracie, etc. xxx^{mo} septimo. Et de xl ℔., receptis racione medietatis quater viginti librarum de custuma decem nauium que subito recesserunt de portu de Abirden, causa inimicorum, incustumate, de anno gracie, etc. xxx^{mo} sexto. Et nihil hic de aliis quadraginta libris residuis, quia Johannes Hayll recepit easdem per quamdam conuencionem secum factam per computantem, super quibus consulatur dominus custos. Et de xx ℔., receptis per vendicionem warde de Dunnotre. Et de lxvj ℔. xiij ß. iiij đ., receptis de domino comite Morauie, de illis mille libris concessis domino nostro regi per regem Francie ante aduentum suum in Franciam. Et de xlviij ß. ix đ., per tresdecim florenos, receptos de residuo quaterviginti sexdecim librarum nouem solidorum duorum denariorum et oboli Parisius onerato in compoto Ade de Butthergask, de expensis domus domini nostri regis, factis apud castrum Gaillard.

Summa huius, dcccclxvij ℔. ij đ. ob.

Expense eiusdem. In primis, in liberacione facta magistro Waltero de Moffet, pro expensis domus domini nostri regis, et Willelmo de Buthirgask, ad expensas eiusdem domus, prout continetur in vna litera sub sigillis domini episcopi Morauiensis et domini Roberti de Keth, ostensa super compotum, deductis expensis computantis in diuersis transitibus et viagiis, per eundem factis in negociis domini nostri regis, a quarto die Februarii, vsque vicesimum tercium diem Augusti, in eadem litera contentis, per summam septingentarum quinquaginta nouem librarum vndecim solidorum cum obolo Parisius, computatam in sterlingis, ij^{c}xxxvij ℔. vij ß. ij đ. q̃. sterlingorum. Et in liberacione facta ad expensas domus domini nostri regis in Francia, per vnam literam sub sigillis dictorum domini episcopi Morauiensis, domini Alexandri de Setona, et magistri

Walteri de Twynham, datam in castro de Gaillart, iij° die Septembris, anno gracie, etc. xxx° quinto, deductis expensis computantis, factis per vices extra laborando in negociis regiis in Scocia et in Francia, ij^{c}lxix ℔. xviij ß. iij ₫. sterlingorum. Et in liberacione facta Willelmo de Buthirgask, ad expensas domus supradicte, per vnam literam sub sigillis dictorum domini episcopi Morauiensis et domini Roberti de Keth, datam apud Gaillart, decimo die Octobris, anno gracie, etc. xxx^{mo} sexto, ostensam super compotum, per summam sexaginta quinque librarum Parisius, computatam in sterlingis, xx ℔. vj ß. iij ₫. Et in liberacione facta eidem Willelmo, per duas literas suas sub sigillo suo, ostensas super compotum, ad expensas domus supradicte, continentes mille quinquaginta septem florenos regales, computatos in sterlingis, computando pro quolibet floreno quatuor solidos sterlingorum, ij^{c}xj ℔. viij ß. sterlingorum.

Summa huius, dccxxxviij ℔. xix ß. viij ₫. ℚ.

Idem computat in solucione facta magistris Waltero de Moffet et Davidi Vnyot, nunciis domini nostri regis, missis in Angliam, ad expensas suas, xx ℔. Et in solucione facta cuidam nuncio domini regis Francie, misso in Scocia, de dono domini nostri, per summam sex librarum Parisius, xxxvij ß. vj ₫. sterlingorum. Et in solucione facta Archibaldo de Cragbarry, transeunti in negociis domini regis ad comitem de Gelre, iiij ℔. Et in solucione facta Roberto pellipario, transeunti cum literis domini regis in Norwagia, pro expensis suis, lx ß. Et in solucione facta cuidam cissori, misso de Parisius vsque Gaillart, ex parte societatis de Bard, per summam quatuor solidorum Parisiensium, xv ₫. sterlingorum. Et in solucione facta pro factura septemdecim vexillorum de armis domini regis, per summam triginta duarum librarum sex solidorum Parisius, computatam in sterlingis, x ℔. xxij ₫. ob. Et in solucione facta computanti, pro dampnis et grauaminibus illatis quibusdam mercatoribus Flandrie, quorum naues, de mandato speciali comitis Marchie et Andree de Morauia, tunc custodum de Berwyco, in aquam de Tay misse, periclitabantur, per literas ipsorum dominorum, ostensas super compotum, iij^{c}lix ℔. iiij ß. Et domino Eugenio de Garansers, per literam domini regis de precepto, sigillo suo priuato signatam, ostensam super compotum, cxx ℔. xv ß. Et notandum, quod computans tenetur alias onerari de hac summa liberata dicto domino Eugenio, si contigerit ipsum eandem summam ex nunc ad opus domini regis recuperare. Et in solucione facta pro diuersis vadiis vigilancium in villa Berwyci, ad obsidionem eiusdem, tempore quo dominus Alexander de Setona extiterat custos ville eiusdem, et dominus comes Marchie custos castri eiusdem, per octo literas testimoniales domini Alexandri de Setona et balliuorum eiusdem, ostensas super compotum, clxiiij ℔. xix ß. v ð. ob. Et non plus ad presens, quia computans non habuit plures euidencias. Et in solucione facta Waltero de Allyrdas, pro dampnis sibi factis in bladis et catallis ad obsidionem pele de Dunnotre, vj ℔. xj ß. viij ð. Nota.

Summa huius, dciiij^{xx}x ℔. x ß. ix ð.

Item, allocantur computanti, pro superexpensis suis vltimi compoti sui, redditi apud Rostinoth, ccciiij^{xx}v ℔. xij ß. vj ð. q̃. Et in solucione facta pro cogga de Benmound, vendita domino nostro regi per Reginaldum More, et pro reparacione eiusdem, expensisque nautarum eiusdem, factis per eundem Reginaldum, per literam domini nostri regis, sub sigillo suo priuato, patentem, ostensam super compotum, cc ℔. Et allocantur computanti, in complementum solucionis mille marcarum, debitarum per quondam reuerende memorie dominum Robertum, Dei gracia regem Scocie, per literam suam obligatoriam, quam computans manucepit liberare domino Andree de Morauia, locum tenenti domini regis, clxvj ℔. xiij ß. iiij ð., sub condicione subsequenti, quod si poterit inueniri quod dictus computans cepit solucionem dictarum mille marcarum fieri tantum ad manus comitis Attholie in redempcione sua mille marcarum debitarum predicto domino regi Roberto, solucio dictarum centum sexaginta sex librarum tresdecim solidorum et quatuor denariorum redundabit ad cameram regiam, et dictus computans tenebit se ad solucionem dicti comitis, per assignacionem sibi factam, vt creditur, eidem comiti in sua redempcione per dominum regem, sin autem fiat allocacio rata et racionabilis, vt supra. Et allocantur computanti pro sexcentis florenis de Florencia, acomodatis per computantem ad coronacionem domini regis apud Sconam, c ℔. Et allocantur computanti, pro expensis domini abbatis de Kylwynyn, venientis de partibus transmarinis in negociis domini regis infra regnum Scocie ad dominum custodem, xx ℔. Et pro expensis Symonis de Forays, venientis de dictis partibus infra Scociam, eadem causa, vij ℔. vj ß. viij d. Et pro expensis vnius cursoris, venientis de dictis partibus infra Scociam, eadem causa, xxvj ß. viij d. Et in expensis domini Ricardi de Balergous, commorantis ad curiam, tanquam procuratoris domini regis, pro literis regiis recipiendis, prosequendis et promouendis, xl ß. Et allocantur computanti, pro destruccione terrarum de Skeok, cum pertinenciis, infra vicecomitatum de Striuelyn, existencium in manibus computantis per guerram domini Edwardi de Balliolo, de termino Pentecostes, anno gracie, etc., xxxiiii., xiij ℔. vj ß. viij d. Et allocantur computanti xxxiij ℔. iij ß. iiij d., de quibus minus iuste oneratur per Willelmum Boner, constabularium de Kyngorn, in compoto suo vltimo, reddito apud Rostinot, prout patet per euidencias, ostensas super scaccarium. Et allocantur computanti xx ℔., per superfluam oneracionem domini Symonis Fraser, vicecomitis de Kyncardyn, in compoto computantis vltimo reddito apud Rostinot. Et omnes predicte allocaciones ratificantur per dominum custodem et consilium suum, videlicet, dominum episcopum Abirdonensem, dominos abbates de Cupro et de Kynlosse, dominum Robertum de Lawedre, justiciarium Laudonie, et alios ad compota domini regis audiendum deputatos.

Summa huius, dccccxlix ℔. ix ß. ij d. ℈.

Item, allocantur computanti, pro feodo Johannis More, filii sui, percipientis per annum, ad festum natiuitatis beati Johannis Baptiste, quadraginta libras, quousque sibi per dominum regem vel heredes suos ad beneficia ecclesiastica valoris centum librarum fuerit prouisum, de quatuor terminis dicti festi Sancti Johannis, de quibus computans ad opus domini regis se intromisit, finitis in Octabis Sancti Johannis Baptiste vltimo preteritis, computatis, clx ℔. Et allocantur computanti c ß., racione firme de Blarenele, recepte minus iuste per vicecomitem de Abirden. Et allocantur computanti, pro peioracione et combustione domorum Willelmi Chapman, factis per dominum Eugenium de Garansers, dummodo fuit in Abirden, in redditu suo ad partes Francie, xx ß. Et allocantur computanti, pro terris suis de Byridale, in Cathania, concessis Willelmo de Creychtona, ad voluntatem domini regis, de duobus annis finitis ad festum Sancti Martini vltimo preteritum computatis, xl ℔., ista tamen condicione, si dictus Reginaldus dictas terras pro tanto de cetero poterit assedare, videlicet, annuatim pro viginti libris. Et allocantur eidem xij ℔. xiij ß. iiij ₫., pro terris quondam Andree de Morauia de Tulybardy, existentibus ex dono domini custodis, in manibus Laurencii de Prestona. Et duobus cursoribus, euntibus cum literis citacionis ad vicecomites, ij ß. Et in vna batella, locata pro domino Roberto de Lawedre ducendo del Bass vsque Abirden, xviij ß. Et in vna petra cere pro luminaribus ad scaccarium, v ß. Et in pergameno, empto pro scaccario, iiij ß. Et in panno, pro coopertorio scaccarii, xij ß. Et in factura scaccarii, vj ₫. Et clericis, pro scriptura rotulorum scaccarii, lx ß.

Summa huius, ccxxiij ℔. xiiij ß. x ₫.

Summa totalis expense, mmdcij ℔. xiiij ß. v ₫. ob.

Et sic superexpendit mdcxxxv ℔. vij ß. iij ₫.

Et allocantur computanti, pro diuersis vadiis vigilancium in villa Berwici, ad obsidionem eiusdem, tempore quo dominus Alexander de Setona extiterat custos ville eiusdem, et dominus comes Marchie custos castri eiusdem, per testimonium eiusdem domini Alexandri, in presencia domini Andree de Morauia, custodis, et episcopi Abirdonensis, cxxxv li. vj d. ob. Et allocantur computanti, pro firma baronie de Kynblathmounth, que est computantis, quam Willelmus de Creychtona, ex concessione domini custodis, occupauit, xx li., ista tamen condicione, quod si dictus Willelmus minorem summam firme receperit, teneatur computans domino regi ad summam excedentem, et si plus, teneatur dominus noster rex eidem computanti e conuerso. Et allocantur computanti, pro superexpensis Ade de Buthergask, locum tenentis computantis, in partem solucionis trescentarum sexaginta octodecem librarum tresdecem solidorum et nouem denariorum, per compotum suum hic vltimo redditum, ccv li. xj s. j d. Et non plus ad presens de summa supradicta integra, quia satisfiet dicto Ade per dominum regem aliunde de centum sexaginta tresdecem libris duobus solidis et octo denariis. Et allocantur computanti, de fraccione domorum Willelmi Chapman per dominum Eugenium de Garauncers.

Summa huius allocacionis, ccclxj li. xj s. vij d. ob.
Et sic est summa totalis superexpense, m.ix^{c}iiij^{xx} xvj li. xviij s. x d. ob.

Nota. Nota, quod nulla allocacio in hoc compoto fit computanti de sexcentis quadraginta libris, pro expensis victualium factis in castro Laci de Leuyn, nec de expensis factis in partibus transmarinis, quia nullas euidencias ad tunc habuit.

Summa huius recepte patet.

Summa totalis recepte, iij^{m}clxv li. ij s. vj d. ob.

Expense eiusdem. In primis, allocantur eidem pro superexpensis suis factis in compoto suo precedenti, reddito apud Aberden, anno gracie, etc., xxxvii°, vt patet in pede eiusdem compoti, de mandato domini nostri regis, per literam suam, sub magno sigillo regni, ostensam super compotum, m.ix^{c}iiij^{xx}xvj ℔. xviij ß. x đ. ob. Summa huius allocacionis superexpense patet.

Idem computat in expensis domus dicti domini regis, a vicesimo septimo die mensis Marcii, anno gracie, etc., tricesimo septimo, vsque vicesimum diem mensis Aprilis proximo sequentem, videlicet, per tres septimanas et quinque dies, et ab illo vicesimo die mensis Aprilis, vsque in eundem diem, anno reuoluto, per literas testimoniales episcoporum Morauiensis et Breghinensis, ostensas super compotum, deductis ducentis octodecim libris octo solidis vno denario et obolo Parisiensibus, computatis in eisdem literis, in fine, per empcionem viginti et nouem doliorum et vnius pipe vini, que summa allocabitur computanti in expensis domus anni sequentis, dcxxxvij ℔. xviij ß. v đ. ob. De quibus, contingunt expensis domus per tres septimanas et quinque dies suprascriptas, octo libre septemdecim solidi duo denarii et quadrans. Et sic se extendunt expense domus de anno integro superius computato ad sexcentas viginti nouem libras quindecim denarios et obolum. Et in expensis domus domini nostri regis, a vicesimo die mensis Aprilis, anni gracie, etc. tricesimi octaui, vsque in eundem diem anno reuoluto, per literas testimoniales abbatum de Kelkou et de Kilwinyn, domini Roberti de Keth, marescalli Scocie, et fratris Walteri de Blauntyr, confessoris domini regis, allocata summa Parisiensis, pro vinis superius computata, deductisque expensis domini abbatis de Kelkou, que se extendunt per annum ad triginta libras sterlingorum, et deductis decem libris pro expensis Johannis de Douglas, et triginta quinque solidis pro expensis domini episcopi Glasguensis, dciiij^{xx}x ℔. ij ß. ij đ. ob. Et in expensis domus dicti domini regis, a predicto vicesimo die Aprilis, anni gracie millesimi tricentesimi noni, vsque in primum diem Januarii proximo sequentem, videlicet, per triginta et sex septimanas, per literas testimoniales vt supra, dclxvj ℔.

xviij s. ij d. ob. Et in expensis domus predicte domini nostri regis, a tempore ingressus sui in Francia, vsque in vicesimum septimum diem Marcii, anno gracie, etc., tricesimo septimo, videlicet, per duos annos integros et quadraginta et quinque septimanas, finientes dicto vicesimo septimo die Marcii, per literas testimoniales abbatum et aliorum auditorum proximo predictorum, vt supra, mdc. li., de mandato regis, per literam, ostensam super compotum, et per preceptum Roberti, senescalli Scocie, custodis, super scaccarium, sub condicione, videlicet, subscripta, quod si temporibus futuris poterit inueniri quod expense domus domini regis tempore proximo predicto se ad tantam summam non extenderunt, dictus Reginaldus inde respondebit. Et allocantur eidem Reginaldo, per mandatum custodis, pro expensis quas fecit in mora sua infra castrum Laci de Leuin, tam pro edificiis infra dictum castrum constructis, quam pro diuersis victualibus que in dicto castro dimisit, diiij^{xx} li. Et non plus hic de sexcentis et quadraginta libris, que pendebant non allocate in pede vltimi compoti precedentis, quia sexaginta libre sibi allocabantur in compoto vltimo reddito apud Dunde. Et notandum, quod victualia empta per partem summe pecunie proximo superius allocate se extendunt, iuxta assercionem computantis, ad trescentas libras, que victualia Alanus de Veteri Ponte, constabularius castri dicti Lacus, recepit, et de eisdem respondebit. Et per quinquaginta et duas celdras farine auene, liberatas domino Malcolmo Fleming, pro stoffa castri de Dunbretan, testante litera sua de recepto, ostensa super compotum, et sexaginta septem petras casei, liberatas eidem Malcolmo, testante eadem litera, lv li. vij s. Et pro feodo Johannis Mor, de mandato custodis, de duobus annis, quod feodum sibi solvitur ad festum natiuitatis beati Johannis Baptiste, per annum tantum, iiij^{xx} li. Et allocantur computanti, pro terris de Beridale in Cattania, de quibus dicit se hereditarie infeodari per comitem de Stratherne, et per regem confirmari, de duobus annis huius compoti, de mandato custodis, xl ℔. Et notandum, quod nulla est sibi vlterius allocacio facienda, quousque fuerit discussio facta, tam super carta, quam super confirmacione supradictis. Et pro expensis computantis per sex annos in partibus transmarinis, finitos ad festum beati Martini proximo ante hoc compotum, et abinde vsque diem presentis compoti, de mandato custodis magni sigilli regni, per triennium proximo ante hoc compotum, vij ℔. x ß. Et non plus hic de duobus annis precedentibus, quibus Thomas de Carnoto ministrauit in officio cancellarii, quia dominus Willelmus de Leuingston satisfecit sibi pro decem petris cere pro vno anno, et Adam de Buthirgask, de tantundem pro altero. Et eidem cancellario, in partem feodi sui per quinquennium ante hoc compotum, vsque ad diem huius compoti, lxvj ℔. xiij ß. iiij ₫. Et non plus hic de feodo cancellarii per quinquennium predictum, quia de dicta summa et de quadraginta libris, per medium sibi solutis per dominum Andream de Morauia, tunc custodem, et senescallum, nunc custodem, propter tenuitatem reddituum regni, tenet se contentum. Et Thome de Lightona, locumtenenti computantis in officio camerarii, xvj ℔. xiij ß. iiij ₫. Et in factura scaccarii, cum panno, coopertorio, et percameno, xx ß. Et clerico scribenti rotulos, dupplicando, xx ß.

Alanus de Veteri Ponte recepit et respondebit.

Custodes castrorum de Dunbretan et de Loghdon respondebunt.

Nota de discussione de Beridale.

Summa huius expense, iiij^{m}dcciiij^{xx}ix ℔. ij ß. vj ₫. ob.

Summa totalis expense, vj^{m}dcciiij^{xx}vj ℔. xvij ₫. Et sic superexpendit iij^{m}dcxx ℔. xviij ß. x ₫. ob. De quibus, deducuntur dccxxxviij ℔. xix ß. viij ₫. ℚ. Qua summa deducta, superexpendit mmdccciiij^{xx} ℔. xxxix ß. ij ₫. ℚ.

Et memorandum, quod dictus Reginaldus nihil soluit adhuc de feodo predicto, sibi allocato in compoto suo pro scriptura rotulorum; et sic in vanum laborauit clericus supradictus.
